The backache and pains disappeared entirely and I soon was restored to perfect health. I know that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the best woman's medicine, for nothing else helped me as much as this "Prescription." I have no hesitancy in recommending it to other women who suffer as I did."—Mrs. Kathleen Williams, 13 Brookfield St.

The Girl Who Had No Chance

TIM'S PLEADING

Chapter 15

It was so unusual to see Tim Turner serious that Ruth was at first frightened. This was the first time she had ever seen him so serious. He was always smiling and laughing, but now he was serious and his eyes were always looking at her with a sad expression.

"You had a queer trick of becoming suddenly impersonal in a moment," she said. "I never saw you so serious as you are now. It was as though you had seen something that you were not supposed to see."

"I don't believe you love me then. Do you, Ruthie, dear?" "Yes—yes. But, Tim, you go so fast!" Ruth held out her hands to him, almost with a gesture of appeal. "Tim, dear, I only got myself used to the idea that you might be in love with me—and now you—you—"

"I know," I grabbed you and nearly strangled you and kissed you. And now I want to know whether you'd be happy living with me in a two story house on Carlyle Street."

But for all the apology in his speech his manner showed that he was not half pleading half teasing when he spoke. He caught the girl to him again—Ruth held his hand and also stood near the mantel and kissed her till she was almost breathless, and struggled to be free again. He was rough in a way, but she did not resent his roughness.

"I don't know," she said at last. "I do love you, Tim, but I'm not sure I can come to such a decision. Please—let me think about it, or rather let me get Father off to this trip, then I'll have time to think about it. Please don't say anything more about it just yet."

WANT THEIR MONEY BACK

BOSTON, Jan. 31.—Hockey fans trooped to the Arena Thursday to obtain a refund of the cash they paid to see the Westminster of New Haven, amateur champions of the U. S., cross sticks with the Boston A. A. team. The game was not played because the Westminsters remained in New Haven, and despatches from Pittsburgh said President W.S. Haddock of the U. S. Amateur Hockey Association had declared the Westminster management and team members barred forever from the amateur hockey associations of the U. S. and Canada.

The largest crowd of the season had gathered and it was not until after game time that it was learned that the Westminster players had remained at New Haven.

The trouble arose from failure of the Westminster management to receive playing certificates for some of the players who came from Canada. President Haddock at Pittsburgh last night said he had prepared to forward the certificates as soon as desired information was received from Canada.

"They say that in Spain the new bull fighters enter the arena in automobiles."

FOUR YEARS AFTER

By Canon F. G. Scott, C. M. G., D. S. O. (Copyright: all rights reserved)

On our return we took the Reisinger road back to Poperington, and ordered an early dinner in preparation for a long evening's excursion to Ypres and Passchendael.

At half past seven Colonel Roy turned up and with the sun still high in the heavens we started off to the front. We did not linger in Ypres except for a visit to the cemetery behind the prison where I saw some of the graves of those whom I had buried just before the 2nd Battle of Ypres. We started off by the side of the branch canal through St. Joan, and onward up the road to Welle. Only broken stumps of trees remained on both sides of the road. The whole region had been levelled by the war, and as some of the farm-houses had been built in new positions, it was not easy to trace old situations. We, as we saw it first before the 2nd Battle of Ypres, was an ordinary Belgian village composed of well built brick cottages. We, as we saw it during the Passchendael battle, was merely a few mounds of red mud where several roads met in a state of mud. We, as we saw it today, possesses some new brick houses, while the sites of the old are occupied by Nissen huts or wooden shacks.

We turned up the road toward St. Julien. It was in the fields on the left that the 14th Battalion had rested when they were marching up to take their place in the line in April 1914. Our journey was very bump and well might it be so, for artillery, both German and English, had often been concentrated upon that region. The road to St. Julien rises on a very slight incline and, as we passed up it, we saw in the distance, to the left, the modern buildings of the new village. We were rather pleased to find that, for some distance on both sides of the way as we approached the old battlefields, the country had not been cleared. Long grasses and weeds grew in tangled profusion, often concealing shell holes which rendered walking difficult. At a little distance two men and a horse were trying to plow up a portion of the ground. We went over to them and asked them if they ever found any bodies. They told us that they did not, that they placed them in sacks and handed them over to the Graves Commission. A reward of five francs is offered for every body brought in.

We could not resist the temptation to wander through the masses of clinging weeds and look for souvenirs. We found remains of old trenches now very shallow while bits of barbed wire tripped us up now and then. I secured a rusty bayonet which I thought might have been used by one of our men in the great battle. There were many broken rifles and other traces of the war. It was here that the Canadians had made their gallant stand on the night of the 22nd of April and down this road the wounded had been carried while the fierce fighting in the fields yonder showed the Germans that, although the Canadians were untried troops, they knew what was meant by dogged resistance. It was hard to realize the noise of battle that once made these peaceful fields shiver as though with an earthquake.

We retraced our steps to Welle, and then continued up the main road, leaving behind us now the memories of St. Julien and recalling those of Passchendael. The last time I had been up this road was in November 1917. Every one who was there at that time will remember the grim scenery, the mud, the shell ploughed waste, the bearer parties carrying out the wounded and the gun flashes that were scattered here and there along the front. The fields now, were of course green and green. Crops seem to grow richly on old battlefields.

The road was very broken so we had to drive cautiously. This gave us time to study our maps and the contour of the ground. Suddenly we saw before us on the left the outline of a pillbox, and when we came up to it, it turned out to be "Waterloo dressing station," a great landmark during the battle. The roof and sides of re-inforced concrete and later for generations and we were glad to think that the old pillbox will long continue to preserve memories of the war. All around it, in the broken turf and collection of debris, was told the tale of the past and when we entered the cellarlike interior, mess tins, a rum jar or two and some broken enamel-ware cups recalled to mind the use to which that captured German stronghold had been put by our men. The wind blew through the open door and it was hard to keep our matches alight so we had to give up the enjoyable task of exploration and climb up again to the ground outside where the summer evening was full of charm and beauty. The 3rd Field Ambulance had a dressing station there on my last visit, and men in Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver have memories both bitter and grateful of that dressing station on the field of battle.

We went back to the road bringing with us a few souvenirs, among them a white enamel cup which no doubt has refreshed many a wounded man with a tot of rum. The farmhouses on that road are far apart from one another and it seemed to us that life in them must be very weird. No doubt the people have little imagination and no memories of the past, but to Canadians who know the associations of that road with the Corps, it must always appear ghostly. One would hate to walk down it alone on some dark night when the wind and rain swept over the fields and stirred the broken trees. I am sure one would see ghostly bear- ing parties passing through the hills of a falling shell.

When we reached the rise in the ground called Bellevue we found the two pillboxes on it still intact. Entering the gate of a new cottage by the road we made our way to the German stronghold and climbed up to the top. From thence we had a splendid view of all that region. Eastward we saw the Passchendael Ridge marked by a collection of modern houses and huts, and westward we looked across a vast expanse of country sloping gradually toward the distant Ypres. It certainly was a splendid position for the Germans, and no wonder the holding of the Salient made such a heavy toll on the British army. It was from the top of one of these pillboxes that the Gunner saw the taking of Passchendael by the 3rd Division in the early morning. It was his duty to signal back to the guns if necessary, but as a matter of fact in the murky air it was impossible to do so. The Gunner gave us a vivid description of that memorable scene. We stood long on that place of vantage.

"Revolving Many Memories."

We thought of the fifty thousand British dead that lie in the Ypres Salient and the rich blood that has made these fields sacred forever. The light was dying, town and already the colours of the landscape were blending in a dull gray. We must push on. We climbed down the pillbox, and, looking inside, where we used almost a box of matches, we saw traces of war and it seemed to us that we could still perceive the scent of poison gas.

Beyond Bellevue, we caught sight of Goudberg Copse, now a mass of small bushes marked with charred tree stumps. This was our last objective when the 2nd Brigade made its final attack on November 10th 1917. There was no sign now of the trenches which the 5th and 7th Battalions then occupied, and where I found in a shell hole the body of Major Anderson. Goudberg Copse will spring up again, new trees will spread out loving arms to the summer winds, birds will sing there and no one will know the human struggle and agony which set Passchendael upon the scroll of fame.

We came to the end of the road, then turning to the right, sped as fast we could over the muddy roads till we reached the Menin gate, the electric lighted square of Ypres. Flammertinghe and our comfortable billet.

KEPT SHAKESPEARE FOLIOS IN CELLAR

American Collector Owns 35 First Editions—S. O. S. Call to Britain.

LONDON, Jan. 31.—In his presidential address to the Shakespeare Society yesterday, Sir Sidney Lee pleaded for the retention in England of the remaining copies of the Shakespeare first folio of 1623. He showed how they were steadily going to America and declared that what was happening was scarcely to the credit of the rich men of this country. He said that since 1899, when an English connoisseur gave £1,700 for a copy, American collectors had stimulated the price.
