A Sweetheart At Thirty

THE STORY OF A WO-MAN'S TRANSFORMA-TION

By Marion Rubincam

LOOKING BACKWARD

Chapter 14

It was months before I heard the end of her affair from Violet. We travelled about so that mail reached us spasmodically. We had gone straight to Paris from the boat, and spent only a week there seeing only a few of the fascinating bits of the city and spending most of the time shopping—since I had to get warm weather clothes.

Then we had gone to Italy, and the charm of that country took such a hold upon me, that I felt I must be almost a new person when I left it, for I had absorbed so much of its beauty, so much of its romance. Then north again going slowly, and stopping often in the cathedral country of France. Then again to Paris, when we received some long delayed mail, an on into Holland. And it was at The Hague that I found Violet's letter telling me the happy termination of her affair—and other important news. It was very nearly June then—Francis and I had been married three whole months!

"Of course you won't be a bit surprised to know that Bud and I are engaged again," she wrote. "Both you and Uncle Francis have known all along it would happen—and I never denied it would—except to Bud himself. But I felt that the few months I kept him from knowing were good for him—he thought it was only a whim on my part; he didn't take it seriously at all. The conceited child never thought I could help being in love with him."

"Well I couldn't. But after two months he was very doubtful, and in a properly humble frame of mind. So then I graciously reconsidered what I had said before and now we're engaged again. And this time it's forever—until we are married."

"You were right and so was Helen, in what she said sometimes—that Bud was too sure of me. But now he knows an independence of mind that he never suspected in me before, and I believe likes me much more for it. As for myself, I appreciate being engaged more too, since I denied it to myself these last few months. Helen says it's always so—we appreciate things more when we've been without them for a long time. That's why she's so happy now, for she and Toby are to be married this week—and you just ought to see them! They're worse than Bud and I."

There was a P.S. on the letter that made me laugh—
"You should see my ring—a regular large diamond."

Francis laughed at this too. "They say at the office Bud is doing very good work now, so I suppose he's been steadied by all the affair of the robbery. When I get back, we'll give him a raise." "But they shouldn't be married on his salary even so." "No, we'll try to hold our young Violet until a year after she's through college—she'll be 21 then 22 when you have given her a friv alous social season. She may not have him then."

"She will," I said, nodding my head emphatically.

And after he left me I went out for a walk alone—thinking of Violet's letter and other things. I sat in a park in the centre of the city, with white swans in the lake and beyond a bit of old medieval town.

It was June and the summer was fully upon us. A fashionably dressed woman passed me, then a nurse and a child—a golden haired girl of two who made my heart ache with longing for another one just like herself—and a peasant woman in glittering wooden sabots. Tomorrow we were going to England, then back in July. And in October we were to open the house that would be our permanent city home.

In my trunks were enough wonderful clothes to please even the autocratic Mrs. Meade. I glanced at my gown, and the soft kid gloves that made my hands look so well.

And this was I! This young woman who judging from her mirror, might be well under thirty—slender, smartly dressed, really distinguished looking in a gentle rather sweet fashion. This was I. And really, I was 37. It had been more than two years since the Great Awakening I thought of the women in Henly Falls who were 37—women who had let themselves be wrecked by the narrow mean life of that little town. I thought of Mark Upjohn who grew noticeably fatter with the months, his eyes lit up as he saw me—they always lit up so when we met after even the shortest absence as mine must always glow with love and happiness whenever I look at him.

Francis was coming, tall, handsome, with a quick, elastic step keeping the youthful slimmness of his figure but adding to it a dash of manly vigor. He had been a possession. His eyes lit up as they saw me—they always lit up so when we met after even the shortest absence as mine must always glow with love and happiness whenever I look at him. And this almost perfection of joy was to go on—and on—always. And when the romance and passion of our first years together cooled—if it did—there would be something deeper, and as sweet to take its place.

For we were not the sort to let ourselves sink down, to handle carelessly the golden gift of love that had been granted us. Almost too late I had found myself, pulled myself away from the most impossible conditions made myself over, brought back some of my youth—and this was my reward. AND WHAT I DID ANY WOMAN WITH ENOUGH WILL POWER AND IMAGINATION CAN ALSO DO.

"Dearest," Francis spoke from behind the bench, "are you ready for tea?"

THE END

FOOTLIGHT QUEENS.

"Many, many years ago, even before Neil Gwynne—with her curls dancing over her shoulders, and her mischievous eyes roaming around on all and sundry as she disposed of her kisses and oranges at the same time—fascinated the patrons of the Restoration drama, the beaux of the aristocracy had been persistent in their attentions to the fair who adorned the theatre," says Lady Angela Forbes in the London Magazine.

"In some degree, I suppose, it was the lure of the unusual. The actress had a glamor peculiarly her own, a life apart from the ordinary human—at least, she had until she took her place as a social person. The actress of an older day could surround herself with an atmosphere, she could diffuse a sense of the bizarre, she could dwell in a realm of fancy, and, with fortune favoring her, could keep it up for quite a long time."

"The great Sarah Siddons queen-ed it almost like Britannia, was painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds, has been immortalized handed down to us about her, and even has been able to invest her demand for a pint of porter with a touch of poetry. And that is a tribute to Sarah's personality which should not be passed over. Harriet Mellon, too, managed to preserve an almost Sunday school attitude towards the world in general, while old Tom Cottle danced attendance upon her, gaily and gallant, his cheque book ready to hand. And when his wife tactfully passed away into a far more comfortable world for her, poor soul, he with an ardor most surprising in one of his years, instantly married the lady who had been his own bright and particular star for so many years.

"These were the days when Ka-

Vaughan, slender, light as thistle-down, and with a grace which, I suppose, has been unequalled in our English school of dancing, took the town and held it in her tiny hand. All the world was at her feet—scholars, artists, and painters, as well as the usual assembly hall of the stately homes of England," to quote the gentle Felicia. Huskin grew lyrical upon her charms and wonders, and wrote enthusiastic letters to every one he knew, telling them to worship at her shrine while it was still light.

And one day Kate decided to reward one of her faithfuls with her hand, and married Colonel Westley. "One could write on an infinitum, and the conclusion to be arrived at is that the stage do fit into a simple life, adopting matrimony as a profession as seriously as any other. The craving for a return to the footlight so often protracted is not often materialized—excitement and admiration are dispensable, and a safe haven and peace are more appreciated by contrast.

"The sheltered girl who marries is not always the best wife, the latent hankering for experience may always come to the surface and may lead to disastrous results."

Arithmetic Revised

My little niece of seven was proud at school of reaching compound long division. Indeed, her hopes went the length of passing fractions by Christmas.

So I asked her, "Jessie, my dear, suppose that I go to the candy store at the corner for half an ounce of burnt almonds at four cents an ounce. How much will I have to pay?"

"Two cents, Uncle George," was her quick reply.

I waded my hand in contradiction "Oh no, my child, I will pay nothing at all, because Mr. Joyce is an old friend."

A Dubious Point

"I am opposed to intoxicating liquors as a beverage," said Mr. Borem. "Yet I believe that liquor rightly used is a benefit to humanity. I am fully convinced that whiskey was once the means of saving my life."

"Perhaps it did," responded Miss

A Fascinating Gift— that charms through all the years

LISTENING beneath the mellow touch of stately candles, catching the ruddy lights of rich mahogany, sparkling over the lacy patterns spread by snowy tea sets, fine silverware gives a charm to hospitality—it helps to entertain; it helps to make a home; it fascinates and charms through all the years.

Holmes & Edwards SILVER INLAID and SUPER-PLATE represent the highest achievement of the modern silversmith's craft. Wear cannot mar its wonderful lustre and finish for it is protected at those points usually marred by friction.

In SILVER INLAID, blocks of sterling silver are actually laid in with delicate care before plating. In SUPER-PLATE the protection consists of an extra heavy coat of sterling silver at the wear points.
