CHAPTER XXVII
 There's something — something you've got to know — Dick told Kay that evening.
 His face was strained. He looked almost as he had looked the days after Johnny's death. Her heart gave a frightened knock. "Something serious?"
 "Very serious it's Eve. She has cancer. She just wrote me. She had an operation last October — a breast operation. She went to Rochester for it after she left Chicago. She was smiling all right, they made her believe so. At least that's what she wrote me then."
 "You mean she wrote you then?"
 "Yes. She had told me before she came to the office before she left. (Something in Kay pounced upon that silently. And he had never spoken of it!) As if answering her thought he said, "She asked me not to let anyone know — she was very sensitive about it. Afterward she wrote me that it was all right. I supposed that meant that it was not malignant, or had been taken in plenty of time. But that isn't so. It has come back in the abdomen. And she knows what that means."
 "Kay was not sure that she did herself. She ventured. Can't they operate?"
 "I suppose not or they would be doing it. She's in good hands. Those things come back it means the seeds have been carried in the blood stream and have located somewhere. It's the beginning of a new life."
 "That's — pitiful."
 "It is pitiful." He turned and stared somberly at her. "That's just what it is, Kay. She wants to come home to die." He added, "I'll have to go after her."
 Kay felt she couldn't possibly have heard what he had said. She echoed blankly "Go after her?"
 "She isn't fit to travel alone. She needs someone."
 "But there are nurses —"
 "Nurses are no good," he said brusquely. "I mean, they are strangers. And when you're dying —"
 Kay's words came now in a rush. "She isn't dying, is she?"
 "If she is, how could she travel? And ought she travel at all if her heart is weak? Just what do you know, Dick, and how do you know it?"
 He told her. He gave her Eve's cablegram to read. He had given her something. Kay read it and read once. He had said, "Read that. Eve's letter from Paris about the divorce."
 Kay laid the cablegram down slowly. "She doesn't ask you to come for her."
 "She isn't in wis. But in her letter — it was implicit in her letter." He didn't give her Eve's letter to read, some fragment of Kay's mind recalled. "It was an appeal at least I thought it was. I obliged her that I would come."
 The shock of that steeled her. Dick going to Eve — unthinkable. It was fantastic, ludicrous. She wouldn't have it. She wouldn't allow it to happen. There were other ways of providing for Eve. They would talk it over. She would find a solution.
 Her eyes were trying to bring his to her. She said very steadily, "But Dick, don't you see that you can't possibly do this? She isn't your wife now. You can't go over and bring her as if — as if you weren't divorced."
 His face was scornful. "What does any of that matter? When a woman's dying?"
 "She's not dying yet. She may never die," she said daringly. "People have miracles of recoveries."
 "You just don't know what you're talking about. Eve isn't going to get well. She knows that. She said she wanted to come home to die."
 "She has friends on this side. Let one of them go over for her."
 "What friend would you ask to go running over to Europe on such a trip? I've got to do it, Kay." He burst out. "You don't suppose I want to do this, do you? I realize it's hard on you. If you want to make it be so. Really it ought not to be it."
 "If I want to make it be so?" she repeated. Quickly she moderated her voice.
 "But Dick, don't you see what you're doing? Don't you see you over. "No," he admitted. "Perhaps she doesn't. Not in some ways."

 It seemed to Kay that something unforgettable had been said between them.
 She heard herself say frozenly, "Perhaps you don't think of me as your wife?"
 "Oh, don't be childish about this!" He had the air of a man who can bear with just so much and no more of feminine unreason.
 She could not help herself. She persisted. "We did go through a ceremony."
 "Kay, you're absurd. You're the girl I love."
 "That's what I mean. I'm the girl you love and Eve's your wife."
 "You're the girl I love and the girl I married. You're my wife. But Eve — Eve was my wife once. Don't you see that there are no social bonds —"
 "I do see that. There are too many of them. I can understand your being sorry for her — I can understand your impulse to rush over and help her. But when you think it over —"
 She was holding her voice down to quiet now; she was keeping out of it all the things which were choking her. "But when you think of me and our children why, then — then you can't possibly do this to us. You aren't free. We have our rights."
 "Kay, this doesn't touch your rights. To go to a dying woman —"
 "She isn't a dying woman. She is a woman who will be travelling with you — even if she were dying you couldn't do it. That's what divorce means. It means an other life. You can't leave your life —"
 She braced herself for the words that he would give back but he spoke quietly, almost wearily. "I'm sorry beyond words that you take it like this, Kay. I'm sorry to hurt you."
 He wasn't going to change — he thought he wasn't going to change. She was incredulous that she had not prevailed. When she began again he said, "Let's not talk any more tonight. I have to look over these papers and then I've got to get some sleep."
 She waited next morning to find Dick in the room ready dressed. He said, "You were sleeping," and when she stammered up, opening lids that felt swelled and heavy as if she had shed tears in her sleep he added, "I didn't want to go with out saying good-by."

Remember When

By The Canadian Press
 "Long Count" Dave Barry, who gained fame as referee of the second world's heavyweight boxing bout between Jack Dempsey and Gene Tunney in 1927, died in Chicago nine years ago tonight. Barry, a native of Montreal, was the target of widespread criticism when he refused to count over Tuppney until Dempsey retired to a neutral corner.

These campaign ribbons have been officially authorized by His Majesty, covering service in Africa, Italy, the Pacific, Burma, Northwest Europe, Atlantic convoy routes. The ribbon for these "Stars" and for the Defence Medal, which is an operational service outside the Western Hemisphere, is in short supply, but there should be sufficient by the end of November for those entitled to wear them. Most home-coming personnel have already been issued with ribbons denoting service in European theatres. — (Canadian Army Photo).
