INSTALLMENT SIX

The boat-train from Havre steamed into the Gare St. Lazare at noon.

Paris had changed little since he had last seen it.

Returning to the daylight once more he found the Rue des Acacias and presently the pretentious block of flats in which Corlitt and Daudot had conversed so often.

The concierge, encouraged by a 50-franc note, wiped large hands on a green blize apron and gave his views on the tenant of the third-floor flat without reserve.

A man like Monsieur Daudot might keep certain affairs from the ears of his wife, but from the world, no. To change his name would be an absurdity.

"One needs to be a millionaire nowadays, Monsieur," he declared "to indulge in such luxuries."

Dighton cleared his throat. The mystery of the two addresses was solved already.

"He has not been here for some days, Monsieur. Mademoiselle Larochette is in, however."

"I'll see her," decided Dighton and went up.

His knock brought footsteps hurrying along the passage.

"A pause—and the door opened about a foot, revealing a section of polished parquet, a brightly discoloured wall and the head and shoulders of a girl.

man that the address he had just given him was totally different from the one written down in his notebook.

Strolling toward the Metro station in the Place de la Concorde, he turned the thing over in his mind, trying to decide which address he should go to first.

There was the possibility that he had moved quite recently from one to the other—to the address, for instance, which he had given by the Frenchman, seeing that Tavernier's late secretary had called on him in Paris only a matter of days before.

The possibility of two addresses intrigued Dighton vastly. It suggested a double existence, it made his theory regarding Daudot and the Lizard all the more feasible.

Supposing that his theory held water, a visit to the Porte Maillot address might entail very serious risks for, although Daudot, the man with the limp, had never set eyes on him, his supposed other half would remain the same.

Descending the steps of the underground railway, he booked to Etolite as being closer to the street he wanted than Porte Maillot itself.

action properly if the shackles not only affect spring recoil but spring compression as well."

Smith put aside the literature and decided to have a look at the car.

He found the car in a garage and suggested disconnecting the two rear spring control instruments in order to see in just what condition the shackles were.
