Dodd's Kidney Pills

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

Be bold, but always so with care
To never take a foolish dare.
—Old Mother Nature.

The Black Shadows had begun to creep out from the shore of Paddy the Beaver's pond up on the great Mountain. Behind it jolly, round, red Mr. Sun was going to bed. Paddy and Mrs. Paddy were floating side by side in the still water close to their house. It was the time of day they love, and many others of the Green Forest folk also love. It was so quiet that the stillness could almost be felt. It was broken by a startling sound that in that stillness would be heard for a long distance. It was a sort of bellow ending in a deep grunt. Then all was still again as if the very trees were listening for a reply.

Paddy looked at Mrs. Paddy and both chuckled. "Flathorns is in love again," said Mrs. Paddy. Paddy shook his head. "That wasn't Flathorns," said he. "That was another Moose. There he is now over by the end of our dam." Sure enough, there at the water's edge among the Black Shadows gather there was a blacker shadow. It moved out into the sunset glow and was no longer a shadow but a big Moose with great spreading antlers.

You are right, my dear. It isn't Flathorns. This is a stranger. We haven't seen him around here before. I wonder where he has come from and what he is doing around

"You are right, my dear. It isn't Flathorns."

Flathorns said Mrs. Paddy. "The big Moose grunted again. It was a deep grunt. Any one hearing it would know just by the sound that the grunter thought well of himself. It was a warning to others of his kind to keep away from him unless they wanted to fight."

"He is boasting," said Paddy. "That is what he is doing. He is boasting that he doesn't fear anybody and is ready to prove it."

"He is big," said Mrs. Paddy. "But he isn't as big as Flathorns. He isn't as old, so he hasn't antlers quite as big as those of Flathorns. He is just a young fellow feeling big, and trying to make others think he is as big as he feels," Paddy explained.

"I wonder where Flathorns is? I haven't seen him lately. Have you noticed what big antlers he has this fall? I do believe they are the biggest he ever has had," said Mrs. Paddy.

Paddy nodded in agreement. "They are. There is no doubt about it. They are so big that they make my head ache just to think of having to carry on one's head anything as heavy as those antlers must be," said he.

Just then there was another deep grunt from over at the edge of the water. They could see the ears of the stranger Moose moving this way and that as he wagged them. He tried to catch any sound however faint that might come from any direction, as good a listener.

"He must be listening for some one to answer him," said Mrs. Paddy.

"He is listening for trouble, if you ask me," retorted Paddy. "He is calling for it and listening for it, and he'll get it if Flathorns is within hearing or my name isn't Paddy the Beaver."

"Do you think Flathorns does hear him?" asked Mrs. Paddy.

"How should I know? I hope so anyway," replied Paddy, a little shortly.

"Why?" demanded Mrs. Paddy just as if she didn't know.

"Because if he does he will come a-running, and there will be a fight. And what a fight that will be unless—"

"Unless what?" asked Mrs. Paddy.

"Unless that fellow over there gets scared and runs away," Paddy finished.

"He won't do that. He is too big to be afraid," declared Mrs. Paddy.

"He will if he's wise," declared Paddy.

"Listen!" warned Mrs. Paddy.

"I think some one is coming."

ANOTHER ARGUMENT

A correspondent asks for an opinion on the bidding and play of the following deal:

North dealer.
Both sides vulnerable.

♠ Q 6 4	♠ 7 8 7 5 2
♥ 10 8 6	♥ K 9 4 3 2
♦ 4 2	♦ 7 3 2
♣ A 10	♣ A 8
♠ A 8	♠ A K Q 9 5
♥ J 10 8	♥ J 10 8

The actual bidding:
North East South West
1♠ Pass 2♠ Pass
2♥ Pass 3♥ Pass
3♦ Pass 4♥ Pass
4♠ Pass 5NT Pass
6♠ Pass 7NT Pass
Pass Pass

After the play was concluded, South insisted that North should have bid three notrump over three diamonds, and that when North actually went past the notrump level to four clubs, South had the right to expect more winners in his partner's hand.

North, for his part, argued that South's final bid was a full trick "overboard."

The grand slam came to grief, hence the above argument concerning the bidding—but both players retained their curiosity as to whether or not the contract could have been made. West opened the diamond jack.

First commenting on the bidding—it is probably true that North should have bid three notrump instead of four clubs; but certainly South was too aggressive in contracting for seven notrump! Six clubs was the right "spot."

As to the possibility of making seven notrump—the answer is that it could have been made, but only by double-dummy play. South wins the first trick, goes to dummy with a club and leads the heart queen through East. Later, by cashing the spade ace, then running the clubs, South can get West into a progressive squeeze. But, to repeat, this line of play is rather far fetched, to put it mildly!
