"Jealous Hearts"
By MILDRED BARBOUR

THE UNDERSTANDING HEART.

Millicent had left the Spanish villa that winter night, after Elinor's revelations, with no definite plans, except to get as far away as possible—to go to some remote spot and hide, like an animal in pain.

She had stopped only long enough to pack a small bag, with the merest necessities, and to change into a simple dark frock. With her hat drawn over her fair hair and a heavy coat wrapping her slender body, she looked like a young girl from boarding-school, off for a lark. It was only on closer scrutiny that one noticed the tearless brightness of her eyes.

A cold wind swept across country from the sound, but Millicent hurried on through the dark. It wasn't a very long walk to the station; there would be a train to New York in a few minutes. She hoped she wouldn't meet any one she knew.

After New York—what? She didn't know.

There was no point in her waiting until Tony returned. Elinor's words had cleared up everything. In writing Tony to return, Millicent felt that she had done enough. When he saw Elinor, she would tell him what had happened, and he would be so relieved and delighted to know that there was no longer any obstacle to their happiness.

Millicent had made no plans. She was still numb from the shock of Elinor's revelations. Her one thought was to go far, far away—away from Elinor and Tony, so that she need not see them in their newfound happiness. If her heart was sore, her pride was sorer. She winced as she thought of the reason for Tony's proposal. From the first, she had been the unloved and unwanted wife.

She had to wait a moment for the train, and she avoided the waiting room, choosing to shiver in the cold on the platform, rather than run the chance of meeting an acquaintance. When the train arrived, she hurried in and seated herself at a window.

Somehow, the motion of the train soothed her. The mere idea of going somewhere, of moving rapidly through space, diverted her bitter thoughts. She decided to go to some quiet, obscure hotel, but, by the time she reached the Terminal, she had changed her mind and formulated a definite plan.

She would go back to Carver Hall. Aunt Het was there. She would find a welcome and sanctuary.

"And," thought Millicent, with a little twisted smile, as she bought her ticket and crammed the change into her handbag, "Tony will never look for me there—not that he'll want to see me. But, when I've had a day or two of rest, I'll write him that I'll no longer stand in the way of his happiness."

She went to the news-stand and glanced over the magazines.

"I must read during the journey. I mustn't think."

At that moment Jim Farraday walked up to the news-stand and before she could turn away, had greeted her. The glad look that flashed into his gray eyes changed to surprise, as he caught sight of her traveling-bag.

"Not going away?"

Suddenly her eyes filled with tears. His tone was so gentle, so friendly. She was unable to speak. He took her arm and led her away from the crowd about the news-stand.

"What is it, Millicent? What has happened?"

She fumbled in her hand-bag for a handkerchief. He took one from his pocket and handed it to her, without a word.

"Th-thanks," she faltered. "I'm being awfully s-silly. But I won't make a scene, I promise."

She managed a tremulous smile.

"Have you time to tell me about it?" he asked gently.

She nodded, and he guided her to the waiting-room.

"It's Tony and Elinor," she told him simply. "They love each other. I—I am stepping out of the picture. I never had a right there, anyway. Elinor told me so this afternoon."

"What did she tell you?" asked Farraday quietly.

She told him, and he listened, without comment.

"And where are you going now?" She told him that, too.

"Elinor asked me to free Tony?" "Have you consulted Tony?" She shook her head.

"There hasn't been time. But he will be very, very happy. He rather dislikes me. We were friends—once. But now," she shrugged, "he doesn't approve of me. But you see," her voice dropped wearily, "you see, I've been playing a part, these last few years—or rather, something that wasn't me seemed to take possession of my body."

"Do you think you have to tell me that?" asked Farraday.

She looked up at him curiously with a dreary smile.

"Was I as bad an actress as all that?"

He shook his head, his gray eyes infinitely compassionate.

"But, you see, I remembered the little girl at Carver Hall—the one

THE PORK SITUATION

In the month of November, 1927, our Department in a contribution to the Press on the Pork situation, which was at that particular time ruling lower than at any period during the previous three years, strongly advised that the usual number of breeding sows be maintained, as the future of Dairying, Hogs and Poultry raising looked to us, at that time, very promising.

"While the prices of these three commodities may actually fall below what the breeders may consider profitable returns, over a given period of years, the farmer who has constantly stuck to these three lines, feeding his field crops and even substituting a reasonable amount of purchased concentrates, has received a satisfactory reward and is prosperous. The above forecast from our Department has proved correct. The Maritime Packing Houses, at the present time, are paying eleven cents and better, for select bacon hogs, and the prospects look bright for a firm market and keen demand during the Autumn months, and we regret to learn that young pigs are being sacrificed at very low prices—some 90¢ we are told, were recently unsold on the St. Johns market in Newfoundland, that were purchased at from four to six dollars a pair in this Province. If a weaning pig, weighing from fifteen to twenty pounds, is purchased at from two to three dollars, it is a very little advance on its value at present pork prices, and the feeder is securing it practically for nothing.

A 230 pound hog is, at present prices, worth $25.00, and can be produced at a satisfactory profit, and it is indeed regrettable that many of our farmers persist in jumping in and out on such a very profitable industry.

Our Danish competitors continue to market their regular number, year in and year out, regardless of the rise and fall of prices, and in this way, are able to hold a premier position in the British market, as their distributors have always a regular supply on hand, while the Canadian bacon fluctuates and they have as well finished and suitable (or the trade, as the best Irish or Danish, at the present time. Last Autumn with pork selling as low as eight cents a pound, was an opportunity to stock up with good breeding sows, rather than sell short, as many farmers unfortunately were doing.

Representatives of the Provincial Government of Quebec came to this Province and purchased a large number of excellent sows from the Falconwood Farm that should have been secured by our farmers, many of whom will probably be stocking up a year too late. If any man is of the erroneous belief that he can make more money in any line of livestock raising, by jumping in and out of the business, according to the fluctuations of the prices, then the time to get in is during the glut, as he will be properly established.

IN Memoriam
MR. CHARLES STEWART

The news of the death of Mr. Charles Stewart of Dalhousie, N. B., which occurred at his home there on Saturday, June 9th, in his 85th year, while not unexpected was heard throughout the Shiretown, and the province generally, with feelings of profound sorrow.

The late Mr. Stewart who had a great many friends on P. E. Island, was a third generation Canadian. His grandfather was Professor Matthew Stewart of Edinburgh College, who lived in Rothesay, Scotland. Mr. Charles Stewart was a lifelong resident of Dalhousie and highly respected by all who knew him. He has relatives and a host of friends throughout this continent.

Mr. Stewart was a son of the late Dugald Stewart, captain of the Port of Dalhousie, and H. M. Customs officer at that port. One brother, James Edward Stewart, of Keene, N. H., is the last surviving member of that family. Mr. Charles Stewart is survived by three sons and four daughters. The sons are William Wilson, of Boston; Albert Milton, of Boston; and Dugald Grievies, of Dalhousie. The daughters are Bessie A., Mrs. Woodworth, of Sackville, N. B.; Winona Penelope, Mrs. Herbert Hocquard, of Dalhousie; Coralie Olive, Mrs. Palen, of Regina, Sask.; and Miss Elinor Cantley, of Boston. One son, Robert Gordon Caldwell, was wounded in the late war at St. Julien in 1915 and later died in Toronto as the result of the wounds received.

The funeral took place on Monday afternoon from the deceased's late home "Bellevue" and was largely attended by friends from far and near being in attendance to pay their last tribute of respect to the departed. The services were conducted by the Rev. Mr. George of the United Church, assisted by Rev. R. J. Coleman of the Anglican Church, Rev. Dr. Graeb, Presbyterian, all of Dalhousie, and Rev. Mr. Mcintosh of the United Church, John Midgley of Dalhousie Campbellton.

The floral offerings were many and most beautiful, testifying to the general high esteem in which the Winton of Campbellton, W. S. (deceased gentleman was held—Montgomery, A. H. McKenzie and (Campbellton Graphic.)

"WRITE."

THE PORK SITUATION

In our opinion, the price of hogs never falls below the actual cost of production, in Prince Edward Island, as we can produce them here as cheaply—and more cheaply—than the majority of our competitors and the general trend of prices leaves a satisfactory margin of profit to the man who understands growing cheap feed and is careful in his breeding operations, to avoid unnecessary losses.

The prices received by our Shipping Clubs, during the past six months, have been very satisfactory. This is the first time that we remember of our farmers being able to receive a price equal to that secured by Upper Canadian breeders, who, some years ago, were receiving from one to two cents a pound higher than our Maritime farmers were paid for similar weights, and in view of the probable prices for our root and grain crops, and the demand for all meat, especially pork products, we would advise our farmers to stock up with all the young pigs they can profitably finish.

Public Health Problems in General

Public health problems in general were discussed with the result that the opinion of the gathering was expressed in the definite form of resolutions on four different questions:

Medical examination before marriage was thoroughly approved, in principle, particularly as a method of striking at preventable disease.

Similarly, careful medical examination of immigrants was strongly supported on the same general grounds with specific mention of the huge economic losses which resulted when unfit persons succeeded in entering the Dominion as settlers.

General adoption of a periodic health examination—a species of annual stock-taking which would reveal disease while still in an incipient form—was urged.

Action to reduce the present high maternal mortality rate was also urged.

Dr. Gordon Bates, national secretary, presented the report for the past year which showed a widespread increase in the Council's educational activities. The program is to be developed still further during the coming year.

Members elected to the National Board included: Dr. A. C. Jost, Halifax; Hon. Dr. W. F. Roberts, Saint John; Hon. Dr. H. J. Taylor, Fredericton; Dr. Joseph Hayes, Halifax; Dr. I. J. Yeo, Charlottetown, P.E.I.
