What Could Hanna Tell?

Walter Wellman, a well-known United States journalist, in an article in Collier's Weekly, says:—"The operators gave out some statements to the New York newspapers in which they declared the Civic Federation had done more harm than good in the strike, and intimating that Mr. Hanna would do better not to mix politics with labor questions. Hanna was indignant. He called up George W. Perkins. Perkins told Hanna not to mind what the railroad Presidents were saying—to let it pass. 'But I do mind, and I won't let it pass,' replied Hanna. 'Perkins, I want to serve notice on these men, through you, that if I ever see another line like that in the papers coming from them I will go to New York, call a meeting of labor people at Cooper Union, and I'll give the full history of this coal strike. You know what that means.' Mr. Perkins passed the word on to the Presidents, and they have not uttered a word in criticism of Hanna or the Civic Federation since."

Wellman wrote this just before the strike was settled, and while Hanna himself was striving to bring about an understanding. It has not been lost sight of, however, and several newspapers across the line are suggesting that much might be forgiven if Mr. Hanna told the whole story anyway. Some of them regret that the operators did not adopt towards him that lofty air of patronizing condescension which invariably characterized their dealings with Mr. Mitchell. In which case there is little doubt that Mr. Hanna would not have displayed the same skillful, shrewd, and in the end triumphant, tactics of the strike leader. His methods might in the end have been more ponderous, and rough—very rough. The operators are to be blamed for not giving Hanna an opportunity to tell all he knows, and he knows a lot evidently.
