PREPARING FOR THE BLESSED EVENT

"Miracle" All-Cereal Ration brings fox or mink into the breeding season in top condition. Thin, rundown animals are quickly built up to come through whelping more easily and to be better nurses when fed this scientifically balanced feed. That's because it is rich in all necessary minerals, proteins and vitamins which go to build sustained health and strength.

"Miracle" All-Cereal Ration is also fortified with specially processed Rex Wheat Germ Oil. The unsaturates in the oil later help to promote richer, thicker furs on the pups or kits.

PEANUTS AND PORK HAVE LEADING ROLE FOR VITAMIN B

Molasses, peanuts, pork and like a funny combination of but experts on the Canadian Council of Nutrition state that they are among the best sources of vitamin B1, along with liver, dried peas and beans. All the B vitamins, known as the B complex, are found in potatoes, cereals and milk.

In the diet survey made in 1939 and 1940, it was indicated that the most common deficiencies in the Canadian diet were: First: the B vitamins, then in order, vitamin C, calcium, iron and vitamin A. According to nutritionists, the second most important diet deficiency, vitamin C can be made up by including in the diet: tomatoes, either fresh or canned, potatoes, turnips and fresh, leafy vegetables. Although citrus fruits: oranges, grapefruit, etc., are a fine source of vitamin C, it is recognized that their use in any quantity is not possible for many housewives who have little money to spend.

Happy Landing

BY BASIL HAYE

The detective, learning of Bond's identity, began at once questioning him as to how and why he had been on the first floor, trying in every possible subtle way to imply that he had been in this suite, meeting the page-boy immediately after leaving it. But—as Bond knew quite well—the boy had not been in the corridor to witness him actually leaving Suite No. 17—and denial was easily given.

Bond had carefully refrained from touching anything in the room. He was not to be caught by fingerprints.

The one snag, which stood out, was his own earlier connexion with the man. He could not deny this. Anna was one reason, while Delma was another, apart from the certainty that police inquiries could elicit the fact from at least one official source, M. I. 5.

On the other hand, M. I. 5 would be exceedingly anxious that much of the truth behind this affair should be hushed up, and would take steps to ensure that.

It was obvious, however, that the care he had originally taken not to be mixed up in the business had—through mentioning Delma's suite to the page-boy on the spur of the moment—failed somewhat in its purpose. All he could do now was to lessen the bad effects as much as possible. Therefore, when the hotel-detective plied him with inquiries as to whether he had any acquaintance with Gregorescu, he evaded the issue as far as he could.

This point had been reached when an official from Scotland Yard was admitted. At sight of the ruddy-faced, burly personality of the newcomer, Bond felt a certain relief. For the inspector, staring at him in surprise, held out a hand.

"Hullo? Fancy meeting you here, sir! It's Wing Commander Michael Bond, surely?"

"We don't use the rank now, House!" Bond corrected during their handshake, easier by far in his mind now the inspector had chanced on the scene.

"You're not involved in this affair are you, sir?" the inspector asked, puzzled, and Bond shrugged his shoulders.

"The house-detective here seems to think I must be."

A statement which, in self-defence, the detective proceeded to explain, while the inspector listened. He then turned to Bond.

"Looks as if you'll have to keep around, sir, in case I want you for questioning," he said.

BOND RECEIVES A WARNING

The inspector suggested that the entrance-lounge would be more restful and comfortable spot for him to wait.

In that perfumed atmosphere, breathing riches and a certain refinement, with a background of muted music, it was impossible to realize the stark and brutal tragedy the management was concealing. Bond himself, in full knowledge of it as he was, felt almost unmoved by it.

But he had to consider Anna, to whom the shock would be great. Curiously, nothing had been mentioned upstairs as to what had become of Anna. That puzzled Bond the more because of course she had known he was due to visit the suite at eight o'clock, and had obviously decided to be there herself to meet him.

All he had been able to gather was that Anna had not returned to the hotel with her father that evening, and nobody there was able to say where she was. Bond, reading between the lines, could only conclude that her father had not intended her to be around during the little talk he had proposed. Gregorescu had never allowed his daughter to have anything to do with his "business" affairs.

Meantime, as if the Washington had magnetic qualities, drawing to it to-night everyone concerned in Bond's chequered career, a voice addressed him by name. Delma Vivian, staying there, would be the magnet drawing Maurice Lethbridge, rather than anything to do with himself.

Yet Lethbridge was clearly glad they had met again. He had an annoying way of clawing at anyone whose attention he wanted to attract, and the sound of his voice was accompanied by a somewhat forceful hold on one of Bond's arms.

"Just the chap I most wanted to see!" he announced in those crisp, officious tones of his. "Couldn't say anything in front of Delma and the others at the Toreador to-day, but—a word of warning wouldn't be out of place, Bond."

"Warning?" Bond echoed questioningly, removing the hold on his arm. "Warning—as to what, Lethbridge?"

"This come-back stunt, Bond, you seem to be working, it isn't coming off as easy as you think."

"I'm afraid I don't understand, Lethbridge. Since when have you had any control over my movements? As for what you are pleased to call a comeback—"

"Listen here, Bond. I suppose there's no reason why you shouldn't be here in London, if—if the authorities don't mind. And of course you've got your family estate now and Sunninghome and all that sort of thing."

"It's a remarkably healthy estate, Lethbridge, and—soon as Miss Vivian's lease of Sunninghome is out—I'm setting there——"

"That's your funeral, anyhow."

"Funeral?" questioned Bond with a stolid stare.

"Call it what you like!" The other shrugged. "If you like to brazen things out, hoping that time is likely to make people forget, and you fancy settling down in the country, getting cut by every decent member of society, that's your affair. And that's what you're asking for, what I—for one, anyhow—will do my best to see you get."

"Splendid!" Bond laughed. "I shall be very interested to watch the result of your activities. Is that all you wanted to say to me?"

"No. I've this to add. The fact that Delma Vivian happens to be your tenant doesn't entitle you to be pushing your unwanted hospitality on her as I've no doubt you were doing to-day, before I butted in. I've warned her pretty heftily about you——"

"THERE'S A LAW AGAINST SLANDER"

"So I understand, Lethbridge. And, having done so, I should leave it at that, if I were you. There is a law against malicious slander, you know——"

"Malicious?" sneered Lethbridge, livid with anger and pompous self-conceit. "Malicious—when the whole service knew you were an infernal renegade, a traitor to your own country and people——"

"Careful, Lethbridge, careful! Supposing I insist on you proving that? Can you? Was there any court-martial, any civil trial by a criminal court even?"

"Of course there wasn't! You'd too many relatives in high places. "Anyhow, Bond, you keep your distance from Delma Vivian, or I'll put a bigger spoke in your wheel than you'll like."

"Well, if you insist on being so very unpleasant, Lethbridge, I can only leave you to carry on the good work. If I can be helpful in any way, such as letting you know when I may be expected to hop off with a few official secrets, I certainly will see you have first call on the story!"

He moved away because he had just caught sight of Anna Gregorescu moving across the vast arc of the lounge from the front entrance. She, too, had seen him, and was waving excitedly with one hand.

Bond met her, and found that her father had insisted on her going to visit a Rumanian girl-friend of hers, living out at Hampstead, and she had only just returned. She had hurried back in haste, for fear he might be gone before she arrived home, and so was breathlessly glad she had not missed him.

"I don't know why father should have been so terribly particular that I should go to Hampstead this evening!" she said. "I think, Michael, perhaps—he had become a little jealous and cross with me because he knew I liked you so very much, and was so pleased that you were in London—"

She spoke so naively, with such half-shy, half-abandoned joyousness, that Bond increasingly felt the difficulty of his task in breaking to her that news which, otherwise, she must discover for herself when she reached that suite of death upstairs. He knew how fond she was of her father.

On the other hand, though she really knew nothing of her father's chief activities, she was well aware that his life was under ceaseless threat, one way and another, especially from people in his own country, who disagreed with the way he used his political power and his considerable wealth. The Gregorescu brothers had both been marked men for years.

And so, as he told her in a seat in a quiet corner—quickly yet carefully—that she had become orphaned in her absence, he hoped the blow might not prove too severe. He emphasized the possibility — he called it a practical certainty—that the crime was Rumanian work, reminding her how often her father had feared the vengeance of his own people.

To his surprise, and apart from a few moments of such intense shock that she looked almost like fainting, she listened to his story with an amazing calm. As he came to an end of the story as lucid as it was terse, she looked silently in front of her. Then, as if decision had brought her a sense of relief, she said:

I think, please, I will have one of your cigarettes, Michael," she suggested.

"Yes, I mustn't be silly," she said, as he lighted her cigarette for her. After all, something like this was always to be expected. So my father often warned me. And so——"

She stopped, drew close to him, fingers clinging to his coat-lapel.

"We must think about you. The police—as you say—don't know you were visiting my father to-night, and they must not know. What need is there to tell them, causing them to have silly suspicious against you?"

"I don't think they'd put the crime down to me!" he told her. "The police officer who is handling the case happens to know me well. But I can't altogether keep out of it, and I'll have to explain my friendship with you and your poor father——"

"Oh, that is so very simple!" she said. "You have only to tell the truth. Michael, that is all!"

St. Charles Auxiliary Make Presentation To Rev. Patrick McMahon

At a special meeting of the St. Charles Auxiliary in the Assembly room of the Charlottetown Hospital held Wednesday afternoon an address of congratulation and farewell was presented to Revered Dr. P. D. McMahon together with a generous purse. The address was read by the Secretary Miss Margaret Weisner and the presentation made by Mrs. Alex. Coady.

The address was as follows:

Chaplain St. Charles Auxiliary.

Dear Reverend Father,—We the members of the St. Charles Auxiliary, are assembled here this evening to give some slight expression to our mingled feelings of congratulation and regret—to tender you sincerest congratulation on your appointment as Pastor of Cardigan parish and to voice our heartfelt regret that such appointment entails your removal from our midst. The urgent need of Priests to carry on parish work has made it imperative that you should go and we bow our heads in submission, consoling ourselves with the thought that others will profit by our loss. Your new parishioners will now be the objects of your zeal—that zeal for the Masters' glory which led you to consecrate your services and your fine abilities to Him in the Priesthood. We, in Charlottetown, have rejoiced in your successes as in that of one of our very own. We must make ourselves be glad still that others will profit now by your ministrations and talents.

We ask you to accept as a token of our sincere appreciation and esteem this modest offering, totally incommensurate, we know with your deserts and our indebteness. Your wise counsel and encouragement helped us, in great measure to carry on for the past fifteen years and we hope that from time to time you will come among us to bless us as of yore.

Signed in behalf of the St. Charles Auxiliary.

MRS. J. J. DUFFY,
MRS. ALEX. COADY,
MISS MARGARET WEISNER.

The Reverend Chaplain's reply was most gracious. While thanking the ladies for their devotion to duty during the past fifteen years, he hoped that they would as generously contribute to the future needs of the Hospital which has ever done such good work for the sick and afflicted. L-226-2-13-11.

FORTY IS A HAPPY AGE

ITHACA, N.Y.— Dr. Helen D. Bull of the New York State College of Home Economics believes the age of 40 should bring many valuable assets to women "if they will realize the possibilities open to make life profitable and happy.

Many more women today reach this period of good judgment, wide experience, and maturity of outlook than ever before, and should learn to enjoy the increasing leisure.

Dr Bull advises a diet of fruits vegetables, milk, meat and eggs with a reduced amount of breads, cakes cereals, candy and sugars. Less sleep is needed, so one should plan for wakeful periods and plan to adjust habits to keep a balance between rest and work. "To stop when one is tired is the best way to save energy," the home economist says

"Since elasticity of bone, tissue and ligaments gradually decrease from childhood on, and the body becomes increasingly rigid, activity must be adjusted to it. Violent exercise, such as active sports and work that includes the lifting of heavy loads should be left behind" asserts Dr. Bull.

"On the other hand," she continues, "the body should be kept supple and in good condition by such exercises as gardening or general housework."

Janet Gaynor to Help in Victory Loan Program

One of moviedom's brightest and most popular stars, Miss Janet Gaynor, has come all the way from Hollywood to help Canada's second Victory Loan get off to a big start. Miss Gaynor, co-starred with Thomas L. Thomas, youngest member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear on the first Variety broadcast of the new Victory Loan series tonight at 11 p.m. over a supplemented C.B.C. national network.

The Variety Shows are under the direction of Rupert Caplan, top-ranking Canadian producer, and the first broadcast will star Miss Gaynor in a play written by Arch Oboler, one of radio's foremost dramatists. She will be supported by stars members of local dramatic groups.

Mr. Thomas will sing a group of numbers of his own selection, and Canadian listeners will undoubtedly have the opportunity of observing for themselves the remarkable range that is making his voice famous throughout the music world.

Further shows in the Variety series will follow the same patterns as the first one; visiting stars from Broadway and Hollywood, who are offering their services free, will appear in their own specialties, while Georgia Dey, a 30-piece orchestra and a 21 voice choral group under the direction of Geoffrey Waddington will supply music for the shows.
