ROSEMARY'S SUSPICIONS

At other times her feeling seemed like a fever, a fantastic weakness she must and would control. After all, Tellforth found it possible to control any attraction he might feel towards her.

That aspect of it was strengthened by the fact that, though she heard several times that he was in town, he never came near the Barbours.

"He doesn't want to see me," Myrle said to herself.

Recklessly, she discussed the arrangements for her wedding in January with Yvonne and Diane.

"I want it to be frightfully quiet. Then Rex and I will rush away and never come back."

"You beast!" laughed Yvonne. "Don't you like us"

"I think you're lovely. But you know how I'm longing to get away."

Her mother lamented privately about the trousseau. With the extra expenses arising from the earthquake nothing that Mrs. Daintry considered adequate could be done about clothes for Myrle.

"Of course, you'll be able to have all you want after you're married, but it isn't the same thing at all."

She consoled herself by making Myrle buy a great deal of flimsy material with which to make underwear. Mrs. Kane took some of it to sew while she sat with Rosemary at the nursing home.

In the meantime Rosemary progressed. It was thought that she would be able to go home at the New Year, but the doctors said that she could not be married before May.

Myrle persuaded her mother to stay on in town, and at the end of three weeks she went back to "Petersdown."

Some major repairs had been affected, the walls and ceilings patched where necessary, and a metal chimney substituted for the old brick stack. But there was still a great deal of dust and debris to be cleared.

Myrle found time to go to "Greystoke" before Mrs. Kane came back, and help Mr. Kane and the boys to get it into order.

"I hear you're a heroine now," said Mr. Kane.

"I know nothing about that," said Myrle. "But I seem to have turned into quite a good housemaid."

"You didn't tell us you were a champion swimmer," he replied facetiously.

Myrle contrived to make Mrs. Kane's room look as though there had never been an earthquake at all; she shook, polished and dusted, and put flowers in such unbroken vases as she could find.

She also cleared Rosemary's room It gave her a curious sensation to be in it. She looked curiously at the photographs and pictures she put straight on the walls. She found a photograph of Tellforth on the floor, and had to pick the smashed glass out of the frame.

Rosemary's clothes still hung in the wardrobe. Myrle took them down and shook them, and the gentle odour of Rosemary mingled with the dust.

She left the room with a sense of being an outsider, an unwarranted intruder.

"I must go away," she said to herself mechanically.

Nowhere in the world could she feel so unwanted as she felt there. And yet when she looked out of the window at "Petersdown," and saw the smoke rising over "Blackhill" in the distance, the thought of going away was like the thought of death.

But no one came over from "Blackhill" nowadays.

Mrs. Kang rang up.

"It was sweet of you to do so much over here, my dear. It made such a difference to my coming home. Roseuary is getting on wonderfully—I really feel that perhaps all our troubles are at an end. You must be fed up with being over there all on your own. Come over to see me."

Myrle went over and saw her; saw her bustling about her home, fussing over her men repairing, arranging, reordering in an ecstacy of happy activity.

"I could be happy if I were she!" thought Myrle vehemently.

Mrs. Daintry came home for Christmas; which passed, strangely, with a picnic, and the thermometer at ninety in the shade. The Kanes went down to the Barbours for Christmas, returning on Boxing Day.

"George will be coming, as Evelyn is still down there," said Mrs. Kane on the phone. "It will be so nice for Rosemary, too."

On New Year's morning Rosemary came home, frail and white, and was carried into "Greystoke" on a stretcher.

"Will you come over? Rosemary would so much like to see you?" Mrs. Kane rang Myrle two days after Rosemary came home.

Myrle realized that it was inevitably expected of her. She and her mother drove over in the afternoon, and while the others had tea in the drawing-room, Myrle sat with Rosemary while she had hers on the sun porch.

Lying fully dressed on a bed, and covered with a light blanket, Rosemary was the shadow of her former self. Only her eyes were unaltered, glowing with their old soft radiance, which Myrle recognized as being very beautiful. Her hair had been cut, and it curled on her head like a boy's. Her left arm was still in a sling, but she was able to use the hand to hold her sewing.

They talked about the earthquake.

"I heard all about your adventures from mother. You must have had a dreadful time!" said Rosemary.

"I'm sure I haven't had anything like as bad a time as you have had," replied Myrle.

After a little pause Rosemary remarked:

"George and I won't be able to get married until May."

"That's very hard luck," said Myrle, not looking at her.

"I haven't seen 'Black Hill' of course," said Rosemary. "Is it in such a very terrible mess?"

"I don't know—I haven't been over there," said Myrle.

Rosemary said nothing; there was another fractional pause, it was long enough to make Myrle suspicious of something like deliberation behind these apparently casual remarks.

Rosemary asked: "George looks very fit nowadays, though, don't you think?"

"It's ages since I saw him," said Myrle. A faint feeling of panic seized her because she felt that Rosemary was watching, and she was afraid she would colour, and Rosemary might imagine things that were not true.

At that moment, while she was still in alarm, the sound of a step made her look round—to see Tellforth, standing in the doorway of the sunporch.

"Hello," he said.

Seeing him so unexpectedly took Myrle's breath away. She saw that he looked surprised to see her, and was aware that he was going to go away immediately. But Rosemary said:

'Oh, George, I'm so glad you could come! Don't go away, come and sit with us. There's room for you on the sofa beside Myrle."

Refresher Course Concludes Tonight

The fourth session of the nurses refresher course at the Cundall Home was held last evening with a large attendance.

The first speaker Mother Loyola of the Charlottetown Hospital, outlined the essentials of an adequate diet and developed the topic, "Foods, Facts and Fallacies," bringing together the knowledge the nurses had previously gathered in their studies and some of the newer ideas in nutrition.

Miss Marjorie Chandler, B.Sc., spoke on Diet Therapy treating especially with reduction diets, diets in fever and in constipation. Miss Chandler brought out the advisability of having all special diets on the Adequate Diets so that at all times proteins, minerals, and vitamines would be given in sufficient amounts.

Mrs. Marjorie MacQuarrie, B.Sc., discussed the knowledge nurses should have of diabetes in order to be able to help their patients. She pointed out the difference between diet for diabetes in pre-insulin days and now when a patient may follow a well-balanced dietary regime.

The closing meeting of the course will be held this evening at eight o'clock at the Cundall Home.

Morgan And Others Score In Story Of Cap'n Bob Yancey

There is the flavor of American tradition and a warm atmosphere of family life in "The Vanishing Virginian," which opens an engagement of two days at the Prince Edward Theatre to-day.

The picture is based on the best-selling viography by Rebecia Yancey Williams. It closely follows the narrative, with Frank Morgan appearing in the title role as Cap'n Bob Yancey, the author's father. Morgan is completely in command of the fiery, lovable character he impersonates.

The story is without artificiality in plot or treatment. It is merely the account of Cap'n Bob Yancey, for many years the State's Attorney for the City of Lynchburg, and his remarkable family. The love of home and the lofty ideals fixed by him like the picture as they did the book. The two older daughters enter into their romances with his blessing and he faces triumph and defeat alike with courage and fortitude, but always amusingly.

Fine Casting

Morgan plays Cap'n Bob to the life, blustering and lovable at the same time. Spring Byington is completely endearing as his absent-minded but jealous wife, and Kathryn Grayson scores an outstanding success as Rebecca Yancey, the daughter who wants to be a musician but who is forced to study painting because of family tradition.

Other excellent portrayals are offered by Natalie Thompson as the daughter who wants to become a woman lawyer, Douglas Newland and Mark Daniels as the respective swains of the two grown-up daughters, and by Juanita Quigley, Scotty Beckett and Dickie Jones as the youngsters in the family.

Death At New Haven Of Mrs. John Devereaux

The death occurred at New Haven on the evening of July 22, 1942, of Mrs. John Devereaux aged seventy seven years. Deceased had been in her usual good health until ten weeks ago when she was suddenly stricken with a serious heart condition. Despite the best medical and nursing care she gradually became worse and the end came peacefully on the above mentioned date.

She leaves to mourn the loss of a kind and loving mother, one daughter, Mary, R.N., three sons, Joseph and Frank in Worcester, Mass., and Ivan New Haven. Her husband pre-deceased her four years ago. A son, Jack, also died about fifteen years ago.

Her funeral will take place on Friday, July 24, to St. Ann's Church, Lot 65.

tential threat to the German flank and might be the birthplace of a Russian counter-attack against the extended 1,000,000 man invasion force over-running the rich farm and industrial basin of the Don.

Thunderous artillery duels were fought on the Kalinin front northwest of Moscow and before besieged Leningrad but the rest of the 2000-mile front was relatively quiet compared to the bitter fury of the conflict along the Don.

(The German communique claimed Nazi and Slovak troops had reached the outskirts of Rostov and penetrated fortified bridgehead positions. Russian attacks northeast of Voronezh and on the Leningrad front and its neighboring Volkhov sector to the south, were assertedly repulsed.)

Russia's military position was declared to be the most critical in the 13 months of her war.

While the great battle raged for Rostov, capital of the northern Caucasus, other Russian troops under Marshal Semeon Timoshenko's command fought grimly at Tsimlyansk to thwart a German ambition to cross the widening Don and cut the railway, 35 miles to the south, which is the last remaining rail connection from Stalingrad to the Caucasus. The German threat was poised like a dagger at Zimovniki, Sal and Kotelnikovo on the railway. A dispatch said the Red army lately had improved its position in that area.

HULL SKETCHES

ment of an international court of justice, interchange of national currencies at stable rates and other policies designed to improve the social and economic status of all mankind.

At the same time he warned the remaining neutral countries that their professions of neutrality were "absurd and suicidal" in the face of the world-wide conflict and called upon "all peoples who prize liberty" to fight for it as their duty.

The State Secretary advocated the widely discussed "period of transition" immediately after the war during which the United Nations co-operatively must "supplement and make more effective the action of countries individually in re-establishing public order, in providing swift relief, in meeting the manifold problems of readjustment.

"Neither victory nor any form of post-war settlement will of itself create a millenium," he said. "Rather, we shall be offered an opportunity to eliminate vast obstacles and wastes, to make available additional means of advancing national and international standards; to create new facilities whereby the natural resources of the earth and the products of human hands and brains can be more effectively utilized for the promotion of human welfare..." he said.

To prevent war, Hull said it was "plain that some international agency must be created which can —by force, if necessary—keep the peace among nations in the future."

"There must be international co-operative action to set up the mechanism which can thus insure peace," he went on. "This must include eventual adjustment of national armaments in such a manner that the rule of law cannot be successfully challenged and that the burdent of armaments may be reduced to a minimum...

"It is plain that one of the institutions which must be established and be given vitality is an international court of justice. It is equally clear that, in the process of re-establishing international order, the United Nations must exercise surveillance over aggressor nations until such time as the latter demonstrate their willingness and ability to live at peace with other nations."

"There is no surer way for men and for nations to show themselves unworthy of liberty," Hull warned, "than by supine submission and refusal to fight, to render more difficult the task of those who are fighting for the preservation of human freedom—unless it be to align themselves freely and voluntarily with the destroyers of liberty."

Promises Offensive Action

Of the war itself, Hull said:—

"We cannot win this war by standing at our borders and limiting ourselves to beating off attacks. Air, submarine and other forms of assault can be effectively defeated only if those attacked seek out and destroy the sources of attack.

"We shall send all the aid that we can to our gallant allies. And we shall seek out our enemies and attack them at any and every point of the globe at which the destruction of the Axis forces can be accomplished most effectively, most speedily and most certainly."

"We know the magnitude of the task before us... However long the road, we shall press on to the final victory. . . .

"Hitler's purpose is, first, to conquer continental Europe, and then to seize the British Isles, and through control of the British fleet to dominate the seven seas."

"It was in these circumstances," he added, "that our government felt the compelling importance of adopting the policy of aid to Great Britain and to other nations which resisted aggression, as set forth in the lease-lend act submitted to Congress in January, 1941."

Queen's Fund Sends Gifts To Famous Hospital In London

Resuscitation Trolleys Provided for Air Raid Casualties

In response to an appeal from the Lord Mayor of London, the Queen's Canadian Fund is buying two mobile resuscitation trolleys for use in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London. These trolleys which cost $1,100 each, will be used in the wards reserved for air raid suffers.

The money has been subscribed by citizens of Quebec City and St Lambert, P.Q.

Committees in each place had been collecting for mobile canteens for purchase through the Queen's Canadian Fund, but the Lord Mayor cabled that resuscitation trolleys were more urgently needed, and the two committees agreed to change their objectives. The St. Lambert committee, under Mayor Clack, had raised sufficient to buy a canteen last autumn, and was making a smaller supplementary collection.

In Quebec, an active committee, under the chairmanship of Mrs. W. F. Aves, has long been supporting the Queen's Canadian Fund. Recent successful events were a theatre performance in May, raising $527, and a flower tagday in June when $1,375 was collected.

St. Bartholomew's perhaps the most famous British hospital, is the headquarters of one of the country's leading medical schools. The hospital itself has been damaged by bombs.

Important new techniques for dealing with raid casualties have been developed at "Bart's," and this gift from the Queen's Canadian Fund places another invaluable piece of equipment in the hands of the hospital doctors.

The Queen's Canadian Fund operates in all parts of the United Kingdom through the Lord Mayor's National Air Raid Distress Fund.
