The Old Order Changes

By DAVID LYALL

"But he will be soon—if Mrs. Manning has anything to do with it. You see, if he isn't married, very probably she will just stop on at the Hall and Mrs. Linsacre will get keeping Normanton."

Mary shrugged her shoulders. "All that may happen, at least some of it, but nobody is going to fix this Manning into a mould, unless I'm a poor reader of character."

Suddenly Mrs. Disney went off at an unexpected tangent. "Everything seems to happen at once, Mary. The deluge has overtaken Mardocks. You are going, and last night the Canon came in to smoke a pipe with Arthur and informed him he was leaving not later than September."

Mary's colour rose until it became a roseate flood; there was no hiding it though she bent low over the baby's smiling face on her lap in a vain endeavour.

"Now what did that blush mean?" Hope Disney asked herself, while outwardly taking no notice of it.

"It may all be quite good for Mardocks. Everything is being shaken up, Hope. Even backwaters can't hope to escape. Tell me, have you made any arrangements about holidays this year? I fancy the sea. I wonder whether we couldn't do something together—Lulworth perhaps, or Clovelly; a little house with all the children, and we could do quite a lot of picknicking on the beach. How I should love it!"

"I'm afraid your people would never consent, Mary. By that time you will be a great lady, going to foreign spas, perhaps, or at least somewhere far too expensive for us to follow you."

Mary reached out one unoccupied hand and placed it over Mrs. Disney's.

"Will you leave it to me, Hope? I'm a pretty determined person. I haven't got my way about Mardocks, but I think I shall manage not to lose grip. I'm certainly not going to lose you and Arthur. You count far too much in my life for that. You've simply got to go on being my refuge and strength."

"Reverse the saying, or the pronoun and it will hold," said Hope Disney, and catching the strong, kind hand she laid it against her lips.

It was about seven o'clock before Mary rode through a partially deserted town towards Coppets Mill. An hour later the streets would be thronged with the evening crowds, who, refreshed with food, and wearing the garb of the leisured, would be in search of leisured diversions. As she pushed her bicycle through the door in the wall to the side garden a whiff of smoke met her nostrils, and a little ahead, apparently contemplating the potato patch, her father's burly grey-coated figure.

This indicated that they had not waited supper for her. Freeland never smoked immediately before meals.

She gave a little whistle which caused him to turn his head instantly and then a smile broke up the gravity of his features and he began to walk towards her. Seen at close quarters the likeness between them was marked. Freeland had the same square head, the firm yet mobile chin, the clear unwavering depth of eyes. His hair was fast greying now, and his shoulders had a slight stoop, partly owing to too much manual labour in extreme youth.

But there was a suggestion of power, inflexible purpose, tempered by kindly good will, about Robert Freeland. A man to reckon with, and to whom success must have come sooner or later. He had the qualities which ensure success in any walk of life.

"Well, lass, your mother's wondering," he said in his slow Scotch way, "what's kept ye?"

Freeland could speak plenty of his mother called "the English," but his tongue was his natural vehicle for expression. In his private life and with his nearest intimates he was still Rob Freeland of Clydeside, and gloried in it. There was a bluff straightness about him. He never struck the whining exile note about his English habitation or occupation, but owned frankly that he had come early to England because he had heard there was more money made there, and that he had not been misinformed. At the same time he conceded to none the right to belittle Scotland; the very few who essayed in his presence invariably regretted it.

"I went to tea at the vicarage, father," said Mary, leaning slightly on her bicycle, and smiling not perhaps quite so spontaneously and merrily as usual into her father's face. "Did you have a good trip to Manchester?"

"Oh yes, I got back at four this afternoon. I was thinkin' of goin' over to Granny's now. Maybe we could go together."

"I was there last night," said Mary, and then a sudden diffidence fell on her and turning she began to push the bicycle towards the door of the shed. Freeland took it from her and set it in its place.

"Mother indoors?" Mary asked. She is. You'll be put through your facings, lass, about the minister that was here the day. You've been very close about it, haven't ye?"

What would Canon Severne have said could he have overheard himself described in this off-hand way as a minister? Possibly he might have been too great-hearted to mind. Mary looked the distress she felt. Her face was crimson as she turned it away from her father's rather quizzical gaze.

"Well, lassie, what is there to it, eh?" he asked in his kindly, rather hesitating way. There was nothing more foreign to Freeland's nature than butting in on any other person's business. He was always warning his wife against it and asking her what she got out of it.

A schoolteacher was trying to make a class understand what a volcano is like. In reviewing the lesson, she drew on the blackboard her own conception of a flaming mountain, using colored crayon with extraordinary effect.

"What is it?" she asked. The pupils shook their puzzled heads. "What does it look like?" she pursued. A small boy soberly answered: "It looks like hell, ma'am." Flaming
