To get human blood isn't too easy. Probably the Unknown trapped his (or her) own. Which would explain why there was so little; not a drop to waste! It wouldn't have done to take enough to produce faintness or make a serious wound. That would have led to suspicion.

"More acts of the Unknown: "Making the fingerprints on the wall. Experts might have proved that finger-prints can be accurately copied by a simple process. They are not, therefore, to be taken as proof positive in these days, without other evidence in conjunction. What a blow to the Unknown to have his (or her) carefully manufactured proofs against R. W. destroyed! One fell swoop of a girl's hand! That is, assuming the innocence of P. H. and her wish to incriminate herself in order to save R. W."

"Fanny Gillett, V. A. D." "Dagon wrote this name and gazed at it for a long time very thoughtfully at the portrait of the young woman who had confessed her love for Captain Kennedy Haste. So far there wasn't a scrap of evidence to connect her with the disappearance of Haste's bride, except that she had been caught paying a surreptitious visit to Mrs. Haste's bedroom.

That visit she had explained, and though her avowed reason was not to boast of there was less guilt in it than flagrant bad taste. Still, Dagon could not get the conviction out of his head that there was another reason, apart from the one she presented at Miss Gillett's presence at Hidden Hall Court on the night of Captain Haste's wedding. If he were right about this, he would never learn the truth until the girl he must find it out, if at all, in some less obvious way.

Then there was that mother of hers, the utterly unsuitable house-keeper at the Court! The detective had no photographs about this, but the white, tragic features were printed on his memory. He could see the frightened eyes, the thin, pale face, the woman's quick, nervous glance over her shoulders as if she saw something which no one else could see.

"If I believed in ghosts, I should say she was haunted," Dagon thought. "But perhaps she believes in 'em, and thinks she's haunted. Which would have much the same effect on the nervous system." What had Mrs. Gillett done that would make her afraid of being haunted, and why was she the housekeeper at Hidden Hall Court?

Dagon felt that there was a mystery about the middle-aged woman, which might connect with some old scandal of the Wells family. Of course, even if there were such a mystery, it might have nothing to do with the Haste affair; but let no thread drop. He considered therefore, that it would be important not to lose sight of Mrs. Gillett and her daughter. This was only a side-issue, however, of the new theory as it appeared to him.

The name of Paolo Magnani came directly after that of Fanny Gillett on his list, and Dagon studied the actor's not unfamiliar features with keen interest. Magnani and his cousin, Rawdon Wells, were of somewhat similar type, which was not surprising, as they were closely related. Dagon wasn't sure just how closely, for he had never before interested himself in the matter. He had been told, however, since the Carroll-Haste wedding that Wells Italian mother and Magnani's mother had been sisters.

Both men were tall and of unusually graceful bearing, but Wells was leaner and more soldierly than Magnani. Magnani was more picturesquely handsome. Wells harder and sterner of feature; and both—though they were young and much of the same age—suggested Dante as he must have been in youth.

The cousins were said to be very fond of each other and Wells was known to admire Magnani's talent as an actor. Had not the master of Hidden Hall Court stumbled over an explanation and then refused to go further with it? Dagon would not even have thought of linking Magnani with the case. As it was, he was bent on finding out all he could about the moving-picture star. Had Magnani known Eve Carroll well? Could he have been in love with her? Was he jealous of his cousin in any way? Even if so, would he not have more to gain from Rawdon Wells alive and prosperous, able to bestow gifts than from a convicted criminal?

Last of the five photographs came that of Eve Carroll herself; and Dagon stared into the large soft eyes of the portrait. "What has become of you?" he said aloud. "Have you been kidnapped? Are you dead? Or have you played a trick on your husband and the rest of us, and run away? For your own sake I wish that might be true. Yet—well, I may be an ass—probably am. But that doesn't suit my latest theory." As he spoke the words suddenly might suit the theory, after all. Somehow or other she might have been induced or lured to run off with the person he was calling the "Unknown." Although in writing of that individual in his notebook, Dagon invariably damped his own enthusiasm by putting into a parenthesis "him or her," he was inwardly sure of the Unknown's sex.

"See Mrs. Payntor to test the theory," he had begun to scrawl at last, when, to his astonishment, the telephone bell rang. "Who besides Haste knows I'm in town?" Dagon wondered, still amid, for talking to himself—and even abusing himself—was a habit of his in his rather lonely life. The detective was half-minded not to answer the call, but changed his mind as the phone bell rang again. He lifted the receiver to his ear, expecting to be bored by some stupidity, but his weary "Hello!" was answered by a voice so peculiar as to suggest disguise and instantly to pique his interest. The speaker might be a woman wishing to be taken for a man, or a man posing as a woman.

"Is that Mr. Dagon himself?" some one inquired. "Yes. Who's calling?"

CONTINUED TOMORROW BRITISH TASTE IN GIRLS' NAMES The names that the people of Great Britain like for their girls are said to be a matter of first-rate importance, but nothing but human beings do or think is without interest, and we admit having read some testimony on the point with a good deal of curiosity. The manufacturers of a certain popular chocolate, having adopted an advertising symbol for their product, got a little extra publicity by conducting a prize competition for a name to give her. Six hundred and twenty-eight thousand persons—a liberal representation of all classes of the British public—voted, and extraordinary as it may seem, fifteen capital prizes by presenting a list of the ten most popular names in the exact order of their popularity.

The list does not contain more than two that we should expect to find in a similar list in the United States. Phyllis leads the rest—a pretty name which has been sent Greek pastoral poets gave it currency, but not, we should say, the choice of all feminine names. Then in order come Grace, Elsie, Barbara, Prudence, Jane, Susan, Priscilla and Matilda. Truly a singular list, as astonishing for what it leaves out as for what it contains. Where are Mary, Elizabeth, Margaret, Katherine, the beautiful names that English girls whether in palace or in cottage have borne for centuries, and that have acquired a wealth of sentiment and association, that anyone would think should make them inevitable selections? Where are Helen,
