After Ten Years

NEWS FROM PATTY
Chapter 5

Millie grew more and more desolate as the minutes passed. Bridget had gone to bed, and the black cat who was the chief joy of the Irish girl's life, stole into the living room and curled up by the stove. Millie disliked cats, ordinarily, but she was so lonely this special evening that she gathered the animal into her lap, finding a little comfort in its drowsy contentment.

She began thinking of herself, and the inevitable result of this was to begin to feel sorry for herself.

She tried her gloomy meditation was interrupted by the opening door, and her head was thrown over her shoulder to see who had entered.

"Come in," she called, but no one came.

"What's the trouble?" Her eyes fell upon the magazine of saucy tales, comprehension and condemnation were promptly expressed in her face.

Unusual Things

LEVER BROTHERS LIMITED, TORONTO

Since first they saw spring's blossoming
When came the dynasty of Ming,
And Jubial Khan's horses fought and fled,
Hung Wu, the Son of Heaven, is dead.
His temples dust, his glory fled;
That potter, too, at King-te-chen,
Who wrought with such consummate art
In centuries past each smallest part,
Will paint nor rose, nor maid again.
Strange, kings and dynasties are gone,
And still this fragile thing lives on,
As though death's self it could defy.
The mind that planned, the hand that wrought
Are naught, ay, even less than naught
To beauty's immortality.

Sloan's Liniment

I suppose its the stories he's been reading. Between that sort of immoral fiction and Joe's pool room, I must say Humphrey's developing most degrading tastes."

Somehow it comforted and cheered Millie to hear Humphrey's faults brought out. But she had to do end him against an unjust accusation.

"It was my fault to-night. I told him I was tired of him."

"Well that's not your fault. Every woman has a right to get tired of her husband sometimes." She said nothing about a similar privilege for the man!

Millie went on:

"I don't like to quarrel with Humphrey. But I suppose after ten years one can't help it now and then."

"After ten years! You're lucky if you don't begin before ten weeks. You're an angel to Humphrey, you've spoiled him, that's what. Look at the way Cora treats her husband."

"They're awfully unhappy" Millie reflected. "And everyone knows that it isn't business but a girl that takes him to Portland."

"They've been married eight years," Mrs. Parke said, settling herself comfortably to have a long gossip. "However, I say that at least he has the decency to keep his affairs out of her way. There's some that carry on right in this town."

"Net Humphrey?" Millie defended promptly. "He's not that sort."

"You never can tell," Mrs. Parke hinted darkly.

She was really a very likeable woman who simply happened to have been born without tact. She had a perfect genius for saying the most mischievous thing possible, and she always seemed to choose the moment when conditions were just ripe for some little seed of evil to grow and flourish. She was having with all the good intentions in the world, done all possible damage to Millie's peace of mind she picked up her telegram and went home to prepare for a welcome for her other young daughter.

Tomorrow—Patty Comes.

THE MING TEA SET

It stands upon my table there
With such a quaint and artless air,
Within its yellow garden close,
Twin turquoise ladies, so demure,
Tread purple bridges miniature
To pluck a glowing, golden rose.
One would not dream to see them smile.

Those turquoise maids with witching wile
That some six hundred years have sped
Since first they saw spring's blossoming
When came the dynasty of Ming,
And Jubial Khan's horses fought and fled,
Hung Wu, the Son of Heaven, is dead.
His temples dust, his glory fled;
That potter, too, at King-te-chen,
Who wrought with such consummate art
In centuries past each smallest part,
Will paint nor rose, nor maid again.
Strange, kings and dynasties are gone,
And still this fragile thing lives on,
As though death's self it could defy.
The mind that planned, the hand that wrought
Are naught, ay, even less than naught
To beauty's immortality.
