"These Women"

BY MALCOLM DUART

CHAPTER LV

Morton left the room while the nurse undressed Audrey, and made her comfortable beneath the covers. Then he returned, and sat with her, chaffing her hands and arms until finally she fell asleep. The marks or tears still were on her cheeks, and her lids were red from weeping.

Descending the stairs, he went outside, and stood on the porch, thinking. Then, with resolution, he passed out the gate, a hundred feet down the street, and into the yard of the neighbors who had brought fresh grief to Audrey.

A maid servant answered his ring at the door. Recognizing him, she invited him into the house.

"Tell your master and mistress that Mr. Morton desires to see them at once," he told the girl.

He remained standing, until the woman appeared. She stopped at the doorway and looked at him. Then she turned, and called: "Henry!"

She stood, looking at Morton steadily, but not speaking. He contented himself with a bow. Presently the footsteps of her husband could be heard descending the stairs. He too appeared in the doorway.

"This man has invaded our house," said the woman. "Will you please ask him to oblige us by leaving?"

Somewhat uncertainly, the man advanced into the room. Morton's eyes were icy, and his unwilling host stopped two paces from him.

"What are you doing in my house?" said the woman. "Surely we have made it plain that we do not desire your acquaintance."

Morton's cold stare disconcerted him. He turned to his wife, unashamedly, and suggested that she leave the room.

"I shall not leave while that man is here," she said. "Must we call assistance to eject him?"

For the first time, Morton spoke. His tone was low and even, but his hand anger in his face had its visible effect upon the two who stood before him.

"You people have done a wanton injury to a girl who is sick and helpless," he said, slowly. "I have come to demand reparation."

The woman raised her voice shrilly.

"So dissipation has had its effect upon her, at last!" she said.

Morton took a quick step toward her, but stopped.

"Your mind is evil, madam, and so your tongue is evil too." He turned suddenly to the man, who had moved. "Stand back there, who people will listen to what I have to say. When I'm through, I'll take my departure."

The two drew together. Folding his arms, he faced Morton, his head thrown back, looking from the other through narrowed eyelids.

"You have seen Audrey grow up here, next door to you," he said, quietly. "You have always known her as a sweet and innocent and affectionate girl. She is sweet and innocent and affectionate now. She has been very ill—because I will have things that belong to normal girlhood. I know that now, and the knowledge has almost broken me."

In your self-righteousness, you have set yourself to judge her because she brought a group of chorists to our house."

He moved closer to them, and bent forward, his steady gaze moving from one pair of staring eyes to the other.

"Do your shriveled hearts realize that chorus girls are just girls? That they are young, and seeking happiness? That all they did here was to relax from their hard life, and eat food that was better than that they frolicked around, as your own daughters would do, if God or the devil had given you daughters?"

He paused. The woman took her husband's arm as if for protection.

"You have no right to insult us!" she said.

Morton shook his head, slowly.

"Madam, I am here in defense of Audrey. You have hurt her, meanly—contemptibly. For myself, it is a matter of no concern whether you desire my acquaintance or not. I do not care whether you are alive or not. But you shall hurt her, weak and nervous girl without hearing something in return—when that girl is dependent upon me."

The man cleared his throat. "You brought a notorious woman to this town, and associated with her, publicly around the streets," he said.

Morton unfolded his arms, and swept his hand toward a settee that he pointed to.

"The girls seem quite flattered if Reggie puts them."

"I should think they'd regard it as necks to nothing."

had to say."

He gave a brief description of his visit to the folk in the other house. Parrish took off his hat, and stamped into the study.

Morton returned to the door. "Audrey, can you stand a little shock?" he said, the telegram still in his hand.

She looked upward at him. "If it's something dreadful, don't tell me," she said.

"I don't know whether it's dreadful or not," he said, reflectively. "Anyhow, I'll tell you. You remember Smith—the man I saw on his way to the penitentiary, down in Arizona?"

"And you remember I said there was a man from Tucson who was looking for him, with a gun?"

"Well, he got him at last. That's all."

Her eyes fell to her lap, and her thin hands twisted themselves together. "Poor man!" she was silent a long time, while he stood regarding her. "I thought he was locked up," she said at length.

"Hauling stone outside the prison yard," Morton explained, briefly. "The other man was over the hill."

He took her hand in his, and patted it. "Do you remember the old line: 'The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceedingly small'?"

The little English maid servant came to the door. "Excuse me sir, but the maid from next door is back here at the kitchen entrance, and she wants to see you about something important," she said.

The Flapper Of 1925

She is an active girl—dancing—swimming—playing tennis—golf—motoring and hiking—often on the top of a mountain or twenty hours out of every twenty-four. On a strong, healthy body can stand the pace. But the flapper, like the Miss of 1880, knows that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the one remedy to keep her free from pain and physically fit, and depends upon it. For over 50 years it has been restoring sick and ailing women to health and strength.
