

THEY SUFFER NO MORE

Two Women Owe Health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

St. Adolphe, Manitoba.—"I was very weak and had great pains during my periods so that I could not sweep the floor. The pains were in the right side and extended to the left and then downwards. It seemed as if the body was heavy and upside down. It is for these troubles I took the Vegetable Compound. I saw about it in a paper and one woman prevailed on me to take it. It has helped me in every way, the pains are less, and I have more appetite. It is a pleasure to recommend Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to other women."—Mrs. J. L. COURCHANE, St. Adolphe, Manitoba.

Found Great Relief
Toronto, Ont.—"I am at the Change of Life with hot flashes, dizziness, weakness and nervousness. I had head noises and was short of breath. I was this way about six months when I read about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the newspapers. I have taken eight bottles so far and found great relief."—Mrs. R. J. SALMON, 112 Lawlor Ave., Toronto, Ont.

DAUGHTERS OF MIDAS

BY ANNE AUSTIN

The first Sunday in June the newspapers of Colfax carried front page stories which were destined to set the great Curtis department store into a ferment of excitement, jealousy and suspicion. "Cinderella girls off for Europe with T. Q. Curtis" was the way one paper blazoned the news. Another headline which caused T. Q. Curtis to wince stated boldly: "Modern Midas and foster daughters off for European jaunt."

The T. Q. Curtis party included the millionaire, Mrs. Meadows and the three girls—Nyda Lomax, Winnie Shelton and Billy Wells. After two weeks of pleasantly frantic shopping in New York they were on board a luxurious seagoing hotel, bound for Liverpool.

In that conference in the library which T. Q. in his desolation of spirit had called for the purpose of outlining his suddenly conceived background of reading and education which fitted her to appreciate it. The three girls were drawn into a sort of armed-truce in-lacry during the trip, for T. Q. and Mrs. Meadows discouraged their becoming too friendly with other tourists. Their very loneliness in strange countries brought them together as no thing else could have done. T. Q. a little lost and ill at ease away from the store, was wistful and gentle. Billy sometimes reproached herself bitterly for not having told him when she had accidentally learned his secret—that he intended to adopt one of the three girls when the year of probation was up. But it was too late now to tell him. There were half a dozen adventures during the summer which threatened melodramatic consequences. On the boat going over, for instance, Billy saw Winnie in the arms of a man who was later exposed as a card sharp. Nyda conducted a hectic affair with a charming, dissolute, young-old Frenchman, who trailed the party hopefully from Paris to Vienna, and from Vienna to Naples, but there he suddenly switched his amorous attentions to a fat, middle-aged American widow who was reputed to be worth many millions. Billy herself did not escape the plan, he had explained his motive in giving them a summer in Europe: "I feel that all of us need a change, that perhaps there has been too much work"—he glanced rather ironically at Nyda, Winnie and Billy, who flushed uncomfortably—"and too much Colfax in most of our lives. Here you are never allowed to forget that you are 'Cinderella girls.' I want you to have travel to broaden your minds and your viewpoints. I know," he grinned wryly, "that that is an old-fashioned reason for going to Europe, but I have a feeling that if you girls can get away from Colfax, see the world that lies outside, learn other valuations than those which were given you, first by poverty and then by sudden luxury, you will be better able to cope with life after this year is up."

And so they went to Europe. It was a dazzling experience for all of them, but of the three Billy was the only one who had a previous threat of romantic complications. In an apple-cheeked young Englishman pursued her, in a most gentlemanly but determined fashion, over half of Europe, finally abandoning romance for a more concrete excitement in Monte Carlo. Three days after the Curtis party left Monte Carlo Billy read in a London paper an announcement of his engagement to Lady Angela Struthers, a tall, honest-eyed, plain girl who had appeared not at all interested in the young Englishman's budding romance with the blue-eyed little American flapper when she had seen the two together in Paris.

During the course of the European tour, which extended over a period of four months, the millionaire department store owner took a naive pleasure in presenting his three lovely wards with bits of not too expensive but exquisite jewelry. In Paris he surprised them, but of the three Billy was the only one who had a previous the stones: a ruby for Nyda, an emerald for Winnie and a sapphire for Billy. The stones were neither large nor lawless, but the combined cost ran into thousands of dollars which T. Q. had amassed with so much shrewdness and hard work. In Berlin he allowed them to choose tiny, beautiful wrist watches, studded with pin joint diamonds and chips of emeralds and sapphires. His pleasure in giving the things almost exceeded the rapture with which the girls received them.

And all during those enchanted months the struggle between Nyda and Winnie, each to make herself more indispensable than the other to T. Q.'s happiness, did not abate. The odds from the first had been in Winnie's favor, for it was natural for her to caudle and purr and cajole, and T. Q. was human enough to be flattered and touched by her unceasing attentions.

Billy, watching the tall, splendid, graceful Nyda trying the same tactics, was ironically amused and a little sad, for the role set so poorly on her shoulders. But it was not without a secret feeling of triumph that Billy realized that it was she who had become his real friend. It was Billy whom he chose as his companion for walks and tours of art galleries and art galleries, for she was the only one of the three not too indolent, or ignorant to take a genuine interest in sight-seeing. And she grew to love him during those hours of comradeship, not sentimentally or with much emotion, but to love him as if indeed he were a friend.

There were bitter quarrels between the three girls, of course, vulgar quarrels during which they hurled accusations and accusations, for they could never quite forget that they were contestants for a tremendous prize. But in the main they were too busy and too excited by their new experiences to spend a great deal of time in quarrelling, and no matter how hard they worked to gain marks of his special preference, not one of them had been able to break down T. Q.'s rigid impartiality.

The name of Dal Romaine was never mentioned between them, never by T. Q. Curtis, but Mrs. Meadows spoke of him frequently to Billy, and the girl had the unreasonable conviction that she did not allow the other two girls to forget him either. Billy had agreed with Dal on parting from him in Colfax, that it would be better if they did not try to write frequently.

"More heartaches and misunderstandings come out of a long-distance correspondence than could ever be explained away," he had told her practically, while his eyes and voice caressed her. "But—I will not let you forget me."

And he had kept his word. There were roses and a cablegram from him awaiting her in London; in Paris she received a long, whimsical letter, sparingly but thrillingly studded with terms of endearment. But her joy in it was almost destroyed when she saw an equally bulky envelope, with Winnie's name inscribed on it, in those tiny, printed characters.

In Rome, a Hindu, fearfully and wonderfully garbed in his native dress, stopped her outside the Vatican one day and introduced himself as an intimate friend of Dal Romaine, with the added explanation that Romaine had instructed him to see her and give her a note from him. The two had tea together, Billy self-consciously aware of the intense interest of a number of American tourists, but enthralled with the tales which the high-caste East Indian told her of Romaine's life in India. The note was a short poem, written in Dal's copperplate characters, in a language which was utterly foreign to the puzzled girl. The Hindu translated it for her, and she was suitably impressed when she spoke the tender words of love which Dal had dedicated to her.

Billy was reading a long, affectionate letter from Constance Bradley one morning while the party sat at breakfast together on a hotel veranda in Florence:

"You really must hurry home, Billy dear. Old Colfax is positively seething with excitement. There is a most marvelous soothsayer or fortune teller or seer or clairvoyant—whatever you want to call him—who actually seems to 'see all, know all,' as the vaudeville fortune tellers always claim. He is a thrillingly handsome and mysterious East Indian—by the way, had you noticed that Dal Romaine looks like a Hindu himself?—and he reads crystals with the most amazing accuracy. I'm quite frightened of him, but I keep going back—as everyone in our crowd does. The man must be making a fortune, for he's distinctly the vogue. Everyone goes to him—even the most conservative old mossbacks in town. Hurry on home and have your fortune told."

Billy stared at the letter incredulously. This from Constance! Constance who was so wise and cool and remote! Her heart was beating so heavily with a strange, terrifying excitement that it was almost a minute after he had spoken before she realized what T. Q. Curtis had been saying:

"Well, pack your duds, girls. I've got a cablegram from home. The store needs me. When can we be ready to sail, do you think, Mrs. Meadows?"

(To Be Continued.)

Billy learns that Clay Curtis is progressing wonderfully with his music, while she is standing still. In the next chapter she calls on the strange fortune teller.

BORDEN ITEMS

Captain and Mrs. Read left on Tuesday morning for Halifax where the captain is to take the Car Ferry Prince Edward to Charlottetown. The Prince Edward has been in Halifax now for some time undergoing repairs in the drydock there. The work is to be completed in Charlottetown where it is expected she will be for about three weeks. During the absence of the Prince Edward the Scotia is filling the place.

In spite of the condition of the roads which are kept in a bad state by the continued rains there is a great number of cars being transferred chiefly to the Island. This movement seems to have begun somewhat earlier this year than formerly. This attests to the popularity which the Garden of the Gulf is gaining abroad and looks

The town of Borden presents a very beautiful appearance at this time of year. No longer can the appellation of "Tar Paper Town" be applied to the place for the original tar-papered buildings have all given place to beautiful and commodious dwellings surrounded by beautiful lawns. Unfortunately the town is as yet noticeably lacking in ornamental trees, but we observe that some of the more enterprising of the citizens have set out young trees which will on development add considerably to the beauty of the place. If this matter were properly looked after and the people would only realize how much could be added both to the beauty of their own property and to the town as a whole by properly arranged and suitably situated flower beds, Borden would soon become a place that would elicit admiration from one travelling in search of beauty through a land of the beautiful. Besides the material advantages gained by such floriculture, there would be the knowledge necessarily acquired and the development of the taste for the beautiful which is lying dormant in too many people and which would thus be awakened and developed.

For use in clothing a Massachusetts woman has invented a material made of paper that can be washed and ironed and is tougher than leather.
