IN MEMORIAM

MRS. FRANK L. ARSENAULT
 By Samuel Hopkins Adams
 CHAPTER XIII

Dr. Gibson waited until he saw Clay escorting Jenny Dill from the Alhambra, then preceded them into the luncheon room, desiring Olga Alma who was his usual waitress, and taking a chair on the far arc of the circle. Clay, approaching with his companion, said impersonally to Alma, "Are these places taken?"

"No," she said with equal chill. "Be seated, please. What may I serve you?" She was being the Perfect Waitress, attentive but aloof.

"What will you have, Jenny?"

"I'd like a nice, well-done steak with onions and fried potatoes."

"I'm sorry," said Alma, not at all in the accents of regret. "We have no steak here."

The girl from the Alhambra flushed miserably. "You oughtn't to have brought me here, Thursday," she reproached him under her breath.

Alma's natural generosity of spirit surged up. "Oh, please!" she cried. "It isn't that at all. Please don't think it, Miss—Miss Dell. We don't have hot stuff except ham and—oh, if you want a steak, maybe—"

"No, don't bother," said Jenny, smiling now and appeared. "I'll take ham-and. I like ham-and."

Alma waited upon the pair with a solicitude accorded to few casuals. But she contrived to make it plain that her consideration was for the visiting lady alone. So far as Harvey girl's demeanor indicated, the escort simply did not exist for her, except as a customer. The end ended on a note of almost painful politeness. "Good-bye, Miss Searle, and thank you."

"Good-bye, Miss Dell. We hope to see you here again."

"Good-bye, Mr. Thurston," said the gentleman, addressing himself in courteous tones. "I hope you found everything to your satisfaction."

infaction," a rally which was very properly ignored.

Dr. Leonard Gibson made it a point to scold Alma later. "You've got more credit for, young lady, given you credit for, young lady."

"Thank you," she returned dryly. "You needn't scold me. I'm not given you credit for, young lady."

"Of course."

"Of course," she returned dryly. Well, you might have. Well, your friend young Thurston gets this ideal and loyalty mixed, like the Knight at times. Seeing isn't always believing, little Cricket. Bear that in mind.

"It isn't of the slightest interest to me," said the girl.

"It couldn't be that you're jealous, could it?"

"Me? Jealous? Of her? Of him? You're hateful!"

"There are worse people around than Jenny Dell," he observed thoughtfully.

"When Pete Sargus down at the mill got spotted fever last year, Jenny and another girl out of the Alhambra nursed him through it. And spotted fever's no joke."

"I'm sorry," she said. "I was horrid."

"You were," he agreed. "And if you're really sorry about it all you might go and apologize to Jenny. No, not to Jenny, I guess; you were pretty decent about her when Bible and Moody and Saukey hymnbook in the other. Sandrock manifested a proper respect for religion by sending to the services such representative citizens as had sufficiently recovered from Saturday
