ISLAND FURRIERS

QUEEN STREET

THE LIKEABLE MAN

By SYLVESTER CAIRN

Next morning she rose in good time and was down at Mrs. Parson's so early that she had to knock three times before she got an answer.

Elizabeth hastened in and opened the door of Gerald's room. Michael's basket was in front of the fire, and the great dog lay in a rigid, unnatural position.

Gerald knelt beside the basket. A tweed jacket had replaced his evening coat, and dress trousers and pumps looked incongruous. His face was unshaven and his eyes heavy.

"I came to ask for Michael," she spoke softly as if in a sick room, and he started.

"You—here? Poison. Lord knows where he got it. But the vet thinks he should go if his heart holds out." Gerald moved wearily, and just then the great dog stretched and yawned and curled up like a tired puppy. "Thank goodness," Gerald bent over him eagerly. Elizabeth seated herself deliberately on a stool beside the basket.

"I'll watch him now, if you like to go and have a bath and change."

"Nothing, unless he collapses. Brandy if he does. But—are you sure?" He had not even thanked her.

"Of course," said Elizabeth. "The dog did not stir while she watched over him and when Gerald returned, he looked more like himself."

"The vet's coming early—"

"Then I'll wait."

"His verdict was reassuring and Gerald and Elizabeth looked at each other thankfully. Words seemed unnecessary. Then Gerald remembered.

"When I'll go along to the office. Afraid I'm pretty late, but—"

"Nonsense. You're going to bed. I'll tell Mr. Dixon you won't be along today. And she had gone before he could say anything."

He sat down to breakfast, thinking of Elizabeth. She was wonderful, full and he had to remind himself that it was all impersonal, or rather feudal. It had not been done for him, Gerald Ashley, as an individual, but as one of her servants.

When Elizabeth got back to Westwood, Lady Trevor was lingering over breakfast. Nesta would not get down for some time; she was never an early riser.

"Sorry to be late," Elizabeth discarded her hat and sat down.

"Have you been out already?" Her godmother's eyebrows expressed surprise.

Elizabeth explained briefly.

"So that's why I couldn't meet your handsome Viking! And I leave to-day, so I won't see him at all, because you've sent him to bed!"

"He needed it," Elizabeth was grave. He adores his dog as much as I do mine."

"Are you as interested in all your staff?" inquired Lady Trevor, and Elizabeth flushed in spite of herself.

Really, Aunt Isabel was ridiculous to speak like that, just because she liked a man and his dog. Aunt Isabel was old-fashioned and sentimental, and couldn't understand that you just liked people, irrespective of age or sex!

Spring seemed to come with a rush and Gerald, who loved the soft English country, felt settled. He could not imagine life away from Westwood. Now that there was nothing to hide, he wrote freely to Angus giving further details of his employer and his work, and Angus could see that he was well and happy.

Elizabeth continued to drift into the office to tease Dixon and demand Gerald's company and explanations. Gerald enjoyed it thoroughly and looked forward to those walks or rides round the estate, opportunity to interview cottagers and discuss prospective changes or the result of experiments. Elizabeth
