Illustrated by Vincenti

A come-on—a steer-broad," Carol said through clenched teeth. You dare to give me that rating. And to think I nearly broke with Hartley! I must have been mad! To consider giving up Hartley—a man a real man!"

How many words were there in the English language? Duke did not know the answer to that question which ran through his mind, but he knew of all the thousands, there were none which at the moment, could have seemed so golden to him. He could have cried aloud his thanks that she was so wild with anger. He knew she would do exactly what he wanted her to do.

Of course, he's a man, a real man," he repeated her phrase. That's what I've been trying to tell you. In fact, appearing him in sober fashion, I'd say he is a wonderful man."

Carol's face was white, all the color drained from it. She reached for the letter which she had dropped. Savagely she ripped it to tiny bits.

"I'll get him for you, she cried hoarsely. Never doubt that."

You will? Duke almost sang the words in his relief and delight. Now you are talking. I knew you didn't mean that crazy talk, any of the time."

He let a low whistle of delight, sank into a chair, reached out and picked up the remaining glass on the tray.

Mr. Duke, said Ro etta. That's the one with the castor—"

But Duke, listening to the satisfying echoes of Carol's anger, was deaf to her anxious warning. He after what he had been through, he needed a cooling drink.

You can bet your last copper I'll get Hartley for you," Carol said, flinging the bits of the letter full in his face. I'll bring him to Saratoga. You'll get that much. But from then on—she stopped.

Duke chuckled. He patted her shoulder. She angrily jerked away from him.

Honey! Do I love you he said gaily. Do I?"

Her eyes had narrowed so the long lashes almost met.

Yes, she said slowly. I'll get Hartley for you. But there is one thing you'll have to get for yourself. I'll tell you what it is. A tin cup! You'll be needing it, standing out on the street corner."

Duke rose. He gave her a smart salute, a low, mocking bow and picked up the half-empty glass. He held it high as if he were drinking a toast to her.

Again—I love you," he said. Here's luck."

CHAPTER XXV

Carol had thought she would be glad to be back at Brookdale—Brookdale which was now securely hers. All her life it had been home to her, but now she found no peace, no rest in it. It was good to see her grandfather again, to know that he was well. But the other things were too disturbing, to allow her to find much pleasure or help from him.

Outstanding among the disturbing things, of course, was Hartley Madison. How would she treat him, now that she knew she did not love him? She was thankful that the excitement of the races filled their days, left them practically no time alone together. Until the races were over—until he had ruined Duke, he must have no slightest suspicion of her change of heart.

There were other things, too. She had lost her knack for picking winners. Night after night, she pored over her papers, working on percentages as she had never done before. And day after day, she lost at the track. Madison, who followed her tips, was even a heavier loser. And Madison, she discovered to her surprise, was not a good loser.

On the last day before the Hopeful Stakes would be run, she was so tense that she was alarmed lest Duke would notice it. Her grandfather and Hartley, who were with her, didn't matter, but she must not let Duke know she had lost her poise.

"You're a nut," her grandfather told her when he learned she had selected Pit-A-Pat. "Extension's the horse."

She did not answer except with a little smile. She had picked winners. She would pick them again. But she was thinking that she might just as well have been blindfolded and stuck a pin on the racing list, to indicate her choice, during these last races when she had wanted so desperately to win.

"At the half, cried Grandfather excitedly. "Marchtown by two lengths; Extension second by one. Your nag Pit-A-Pat barely hanging on—she's stopping. That goat always falls asleep."

"Oh no, she doesn't," said Carol. "The race isn't over."

Madison was leaning over the railing, an anxious look on his face. "Tell you it's all over," yelled Grandfather Clayton. "Pit-A-Pat's through."

"No, no!" pleaded Hartley, while Carol's heart sank and she turned away. "She's got to win."

A thunder of hoofs past the stand a roar of cheers from the crowd and Grandfather Clayton was jumping up and down, yelling at the top of his lungs: "Extension!"

Carol bit her lip. She could not look at Hartley. She had seen and had not liked the look on his face when he lost.

"Well, honey," he said, "you were wrong again."

"Again!" snorted Grandfather Clayton. "What else is she ever but wrong these days? What did you two chumps lose?"

I had five thousand said Madison. Then turning to Carol: And you had four hundred didn't you?"

For a hundred is right, she said and turned away. For the first time in her life she was angry at her grandfather. He did not need to rub it in. But Hartley was worse. Surely, it was not necessary for him to be so surely.

Cheer up, folks! It was Duke's laughing, aggravating voice she heard, as he walked up to them. He smiled at Carol and said: "You and Madison can't lose all the time. Nobody can do that. There'll be other races."

Carol did not answer. Duke took a fat roll from his pocket, peeled off a few bills and handed them to the old man. "Here's your lettuce, Grandpa," he said.

"Shall we go?" Carol asked Madison.

Just a moment, dear. His voice had something of defiance in it as he turned to Duke and asked: "What odds are you giving my horse in the Hopeful tomorrow?"

"Moon Ray?"

"Of course?" I'm betting on my own horse."

"Well," answered Duke casually. "I haven't figured out yet. I thought you'd be backing Lightning, the favorite."

THE SEARCH-LIGHTS

Political morality differs from individual morality because there is no power above the state—Gen. von Bernhardi.

Shadow by shadow, stripped for fight, The lean black cruisers search the sea. Night-long their level shafts of light Revolve and find no enemy. Only they know each leaping wave May hide the lightning and their grave:

And, in the land they guard so well, Is there no silent watch to keep? Rings midnight on a vaster deep; But over all its waves once more The search-lights move from shore to shore;

And captains that we thought were dead, And dreamers that we thought were dumb, And voices that we thought were fled Arise and call us, and we come; And Search in thine own soul they cry, "For there, too, lurks thine enemy."

Search for the foe in thine own soul, The sloth, the intellectual pride, The trivial jest that veils the goal For which our fathers lived and died; The lawless dreams, the cyclic art, That rend thy nobler self apart.

Not far, not far into the night These level swords of light can pierce; Yet for her faith does England fight, Her faith in this our universe, Believing Truth and Justice draw From founts of everlasting law.

Therefore a Power above the State, The unconquerable Power, returns. The fire, the fire that made her great, Once more upon her altar burns.

Dr. Bready would like to see history films, but the cost is too great.

Dr. Hardy hopes to see an educational exchange established, and emphasized the parents' responsibility for the films seen by the children. Dr. Moneth explained that after the war the United States was the only nation with money for this new industry, and Hollywood was chosen on account of its climate, light and scenery. Movies now rank as the third industry of the States. Canada is not wealthy enough to produce films, but we can demand better films when the taste of the public makes the demand. We must educate and agitate for this demand.

The following aims were set forth: Plays of a high type, better written, better in style conception, and literary merit.

More exchange of British Empire plays.

The uplift of the Movie is not a local affair, but an international; therefore this question should be increasingly brought before the League of Nations. Financial support should be withdrawn from low class plays. Can this be done by effort? A Vigilance Committee might help the Board of Censors—ADA L. GRANT.

MILK

The poorer the family the greater the necessity to put within its reach a plentiful supply of what Edison used to describe as "the only balanced ratio balanced by the Great Chemist who is away."

Recently the Medical Correspondent of the English "Daily Telegraph" stressed the fact that milk not only contains all the vitamins, but also the essential proteins, salts and fats in an easily assimilable form that renders it invaluable for children and adults. There is no doubt that the milk

ALCOHOL STUDY IN COLLEGES

The medical profession is becoming more and more a great "Health" agency, and in coming days is likely to become even more so. This suggests that a most fruitful line of educational temperance effort lies in well-directed, thoughtful and persuasive efforts to secure the inclusion by medical schools in the courses for medical students of that scientific study of "Alcohol in relation to the Human Economy," which has admittedly been too infrequent up to the present.

Nor should the theological colleges be omitted. Alcohol in the home, even where excess is uncommon, brings problems to the minister which render necessary a
