A SUITOR TOO MANY MILDRED BARBOUR

"You are impertinent, Mr. Jackson," she was beginning loftily, when the knocker on the studio door sounded ominously.

CHAPTER 7 AN OFFICIAL NEMESIS

Dorothy herself opened the door to Lila's knock. She was wearing a gleaming crystal gown that, at any other time, would have evoked expressions of admiration from Lila.

At the sight of Lila's face, she uttered a cry. "You dear thing! I didn't mean to frighten you out of your wits. It's nothing terrible, really, but it was useless to talk about it over the telephone."

She drew Lila into the lighted studio. A middle-aged man, with a gray mustache, rose from a chair beside the big fireplace.

"This is Mr. Jackson, Lila. He has called about the insurance of your late fiancé. Miss Latham will attend to everything. Mr. Jackson, you see," she explained to Lila. "Mr. Jackson—er—was under the impression that you lived here—er—yet." Dorothy was floundering a trifle, and Mr. Jackson's gaze became sharper, as he looked from one to the other of the two girls.

"Excuse me, Miss, but this seems a bit irregular to me. On our records, Miss Latham claims that this is her home, but you, miss," he turned to Dorothy, "went and telephoned her to come here. I heard you."

Dorothy bit her lip and made an inward vow to have her telephone moved to her dressing-room in the morning.

"Perhaps I forgot to explain that Miss Latham was on visiting friends for a few days," she said gently. "You see, Mr. Jackson, we're both in a frightful hurry tonight—we're dining out—and you've called at a rather inconvenient hour—"

Mr. Jackson reached for his hat. "I can come back tomorrow, Miss. It'll be better, because this needs looking into a bit. I don't know as I have a right to turn these papers over to the young lady when I have only your word—pardon—that she's the right lady—"

HALIFAX WOMAN FINDS RELIEF

Now Praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Halifax, N. S.—"I am passing through the critical period of my life and there is nothing to equal Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for all the ills that come at this time. I was dragging around the house, no energy, every nerve in my body on edge at the least confusion, so that at times I almost wished I was dead. My appetite was no good, I was dull and listless, in fact, I thought I had some dreadful disease. I took three bottles of the Vegetable Compound and it is truly wonderful. That terrible drowsiness and hot flashes have disappeared. I can do my work now without that god-for-nothing feeling. Mothers who have raised families should give the Vegetable Compound a fair trial. I am sure they will be loud in their praise of it."—MRS. MARY JOHNSTON, 927 Barrington St., Halifax, Nova Scotia.

"No, no," Lila protested sharply, giving Dorothy a meaningful look. "I'd rather have it settled tonight. Never mind about dinner." Her eyes warned Dorothy: "I may not be able to get here tomorrow." Her thoughts were busy with the fear that Herbert, if she were late in returning, might come to the studio for her before this odious Mr. Jackson should have taken himself away.

"What do you want by way of proof that I am—myself?" she demanded haughtily of the man. He seemed duly impressed, a little apologetic. "You understand, Miss, that it's not my fault—"

"Yes, yes, do get on," she interrupted impatiently. "What do you want for identification?" "Well, have you got some letters that are addressed to yourself, or—"

Lila's gaze flew to Dorothy, but the latter shook her head slightly. Ah, yes, Dorothy had burned the envelopes of Jack Farquhar's love-letters.

Lila looked desperately around the studio, knowing that the situation was hopeless. One doesn't ordinarily find identifying things in an apartment, where one is not at home.

"Ah, my bag!" She caught up the gold-mesh trifle from the table, where she'd tossed it. "It has my name engraved on the clasp."

But, even as Mr. Jackson reached for it, she snatched it back. "The name engraved on the clasp was 'Lila Ware.' It had been one of her wedding-presents.

"This isn't the bag," she explained hastily. "It's—er—another one."

Mr. Jackson's expression was hardening. "Then show me the other bag, Miss."

Lila bit her lip. "I—ah—left it at the house of the friend I visited this evening." She looked desperately at Dorothy, who, for once, was helpless.

"See here, Miss," Mr. Jackson spoke sternly, "it strikes me there's something very peculiar about all this." He glanced down at the official-looking papers in his hand.

"It says here that you served in France during the war. Now, Miss, what about your identification papers, for one thing?"

Lila brightened. "I'd forgotten all about them." Mr. Jackson brightened, too. He sighed with relief.

"If you'll just show me them, Miss." Lila took a step forward, stopped short. Despair seized her. "They're not here," she confessed hollowly.

Suspicion flamed anew in the face of Dorothy's unwelcome caller. "Where are they?" he demanded shortly.

"They're at—the home of a friend," said Lila weakly, knowing how ridiculous her statement sounded.

Mr. Jackson was righteously angry. "Is this a joke, Miss? Are you trying to make a monkey out of me? See here, do you live here, or don't you? If you do, can you tell me why all your personal belongings seem to be at the home of a friend?"

Sarcasm tinged the word "friend," and Lila flushed angrily. "You are impertinent, Mr. Jackson," she was beginning—loftily, when the knocker on the studio door sounded ominously.

"Herbert" said Lila to herself. (To Be Continued.)
