KIDNEY ACIDS Rob your Rest..
Many people never seem to get a good night's rest. They turn and toss—blame it on 'nerves'—when it may be their kidneys. Healthy kidneys filter poisons and excess acids from the blood. If they fail and impurities stay in the system—disturbed rest often follows. If you don't rest well get and use Dodd's Kidney Pills. Dodd's help the kidneys so that you can rest better—and feel better. 134

LIFE ON THE FARM

The food situation throughout the war-ridden countries, and indeed in the others as well, have shown the world how valuable is the man who tills the land. Long ago Ecclesiastes said "the king is served by the field."—that is, the man who stands in the furrow supports the state. Too often "big business" forgets how necessary he is.

It was sincerely hoped that when the war was over, many men would return to the soil. There are three prime necessities that we are all seeking — food, shelter and warmth, and people in towns and cities are more exercised over these needs than over any other thing. The struggle is often difficult, but these are sure to the farmer if he attends to his work.

The tilling of the land is the oldest occupation of man, for our first parents were told to "dress and keep" the garden. Moreover it is an aristocratic calling for the farmer owns a bit of the earth, and he is not bound to take orders from any overlord.

Those of us who had the good fortune to grow up in the country are thankful, for surely there is no place more suited to the growth—mental, physical and spiritual—of boys and girls, than the farm. The wide spaces, the element of distance, the woods, the streams where we threw our line, the animals which live there, the patter of the rain on the roof, the doing of the chores, the purity of the snow in winter, the illustration of the law of cause and effect (what we sow we reap). What an ancient writer calls "the just returns of cultivated land" — all these have an influence on childhood.

There are farms in our Maritime Provinces which are deserted. You often see an old house, where the lights in the windows have burnt themselves out long ago, and now spruce trees have crept over the fields and the one time home is now in the woods. Here and there too in these woods are stone fences which once enclosed fields where cattle and sheep fed.

What a pity this is! It is almost the "Deserted Village" over again. And yet these farms supported a family once and the place was vocal with the shouts of happy well-fed children. It is significant that many great men came from the farm. Canadians showed themselves very practical in both world wars. This may be due largely to the fact that they had to improvise to meet the emergencies of farm life, when all the needs of the house were not immediately available. Thus resourcefulness was developed. A boy brought up on a farm knows how to be useful and has a considerable knowledge of the world, for the farm is really a little world in itself. I knew a man who came from a great city of the old world. He knew little about horses, but had to have one to carry on his work as a minister. Settled in a village in the Maritimes he started out on his rounds one day and did not know how to address his horse. He got into the seat of his carriage and said: "Now begin." One wonders if the poor animal looked round to see what sort of a mortal his driver was. A farm lad would know better.

Writers from Horace and Virgil to Cowper have paid their tribute to the farm, Horace loved his Sabine acres. In one of his satires he says: "O rural retirement when shall I behold thee? This was ever among my wishes—a portion of ground not over large in which was garden with a continual stream close to my house 'and a little woodland besides.'"

This from Vergil: "The gods to live in woods have left the skies." He speaks of the thirsty fever of the field, and of the iron war of rakes and harrows. He watches the "wise ant" laying up store for the winter.

Then our own Cowper often dwells on the compensations of the country. "God made the country, but man made the town." The country wins me still. My very dreams were rural, rural too, the first-born efforts of my Youthful muse."

Indeed as we follow him on a Winter evening, the wind from the hills blows in our faces, and when the door is closed we feel the truth of what he calls, "the intimate delights, fireside enjoyments, the undisturbed retirement the long evening knows."

SIMS - PIERS

On June 18, 1949, Rev. A.E. Coleman, rector of Trinity Church, united in marriage Pearl Wilhelmina Piers, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Piers of Kingston, Kings County, N.B. and Ernest L. Sims of Saint John, son of Mrs. Dorothy Sims of Vancouver, B.C., and the late J. C. Sims of Charlottetown, P.E.I.

The bride wore a tailored suit of gray gabardine and hat of navy blue with navy blue veil. She wore blue shoes to match and carried a white purse. Her corsage was of pink carnations. Mr. and Mrs. Patrick O'Leary were witnesses.—(Saint John Telegraph-Journal.)

Thoughts For Our Time

By His Eminence Cardinal McGuigan
(Copyright)

A democracy differs from other forms of government mainly in this, that not only are its rulers responsible to the people but its people are also responsible for their rulers. While its rulers receive their authority from God, from Whom derives all genuine authority, their designation as rulers is by the decision and will of the people. In other words, the right to rule comes from above, but the people themselves determine who is to exercise the right. Hence, if those in authority are not all that they should be, the people can blame no one more than themselves for placing them in office as their representatives. Manifestly, then, the right of suffrage, although a veritable privilege, carries with it grave responsibilities.

One of these responsibilities, undoubtedly the primary one, is that everyone who has the right to vote should exercise the right with care and prudence. Perhaps, at no time in the history of democracies was this more important than it is today.

These are times in which governments stand in imminent peril of being wrested through intimidation or moral constraint or physical force from the hands of lawfully constituted representatives by minorities closely organized and specially trained for just such seizures of power. We have seen this happen prior to the war. We have seen it again more recently in countries lying behind the so-called iron curtain.

What stronger incentive does the world need to become more energetic in opposing the concentration of power in dictatorships which place themselves beyond all censure and rightful criticism?

Danger In Complacency

Although this country is blessed in its enjoyment of a system of government more in keeping with the dignity and liberty of the citizens, we must not allow ourselves to become too complacent about our security.

The centre of gravity in any government, whatever its form, lies in the heads of state. In a democracy, it lies in the popular assembly which is normally the mainspring of political influences affecting for good or ill every phase of public life. Hence, as Pope Pius XII stated in his Christmas Message a few years ago, "the question of the high moral standards, practical ability and intellectual capacity of their parliamentary representatives is for every people living under a democratic regime a question of life or death, of prosperity or decadence, of soundness or perpetual unrest."

A healthy democracy requires a governing body composed of select men, right-minded and strong in character who, inspired by a keen sense of what is just and equitable, aim to represent the entire people rather than the interests of a profession or a class; men, therefore, who, having at heart the general welfare, bend all their efforts toward the promotion of the common good. They should be men chosen from all ranks of society not merely because of their sound Christian principles but also because of their habitually correct judgment in practical affairs and their reasonable and clearly-defined policies. Above all, they should possess that integrity of morals which commands the respect and confidence of others, so essential to effective leadership.

Apathy Breeds Decay

Now, such genuine leaders rarely find their way into the ranks of the government by mere chance. Normally, they are placed there by the prudent choice of active, intelligent citizens imbued with a love of justice and a passion for the common good.

So, when a democracy becomes weighted down with a disproportionately large number of apathetic and indifferent citizens, it is a sure sign that it is on the road to decay. Corruption in places of power easily sets in through the failure of the citizen body to show interest in government affairs.

On the other hand, a citizenry which takes an active and enlightened interest in political matters is the surest guarantee of good government. Indeed, experience teaches that men who seek office for the sole end of making politics serve their own profit, rather than the common good, stand slight chance of election if the people are alert and well-informed. Or if by some ruse such men do succeed in winning a seat in the government, the avalanche of criticism and censure that invariably attends their being found out causes them enough discomfort and want of security to discourage them from seeking re-election.

But when the citizens themselves show little or no concern, political profiteering sometimes goes on unchecked for years.

Clearly, then, the people in a democratic country have serious responsibilities in their role as electors. On their decision at the polls depends to a large extent the security of competent rulers of state. It is their duty, therefore, first to seek to become informed regarding the suitability of the political candidates and secondly, to vote according to their better judgment, formed by measuring the respective candidates against the qualifications proper to the office.

ELLEN'S DIARY

and without tedious or distressing incident, the cattle were herded to stalls and to a last laddie, a smallish red and white fellow, received the treatment. The farmers' work and planning, their wives breathless haste were our contribution in making The Island a tuberculosis-free area as regards its cattle.

And then the shearing of the remaining ewes was done and they and their lambs taken back to join the others of the flock that have been pasturing amid the delights of the stump-field. We miss them from the front meadow—miss them at play, or when wearying of that like so many children, come to lie in content near their mother there. But we shall hear them though faintly. Perhaps borne to us in the yard on a wisp of a Summer zephyr in the twilight when a silent lovely night is dimming the far fields and the wood-land—then a plaintive bleat will reach us, fading in almost unnoticed with the other evening sounds, intermingled and almost lost in the cricket's chant or the evensong of the birds.

Jeanie discovered a song sparrow's nest today in the creeper that rambles up and about the walls of this house. It is barely above the spot on the front verandah where a lad-of-a-fellow perches to sing gally for me at his fancy, while we scrub or clean or bake, and we forget the labor of task in the inspiration of the song. What delightful creatures the birds are, from the huge heron which flies into our vision often down to the tiny humming-bird that passes some of the tedious period of his Love's hatching, sitting rather desolately on a telephone wire, beyond a window. Edna Jacques' lines on the subject are descriptive and inspiring.

All Summer long they nest in little pairs,
In trees and hedges, corners of the eaves,
Flitting like busy housewives all day long,
The little father bringing string and leaves,
For the small mother and her bridal couch,
Hanging suspended like a beggar's pouch.

And so fulfill their little round of life
Rear their small young and teach them how to fly,
Live close to the great Silence, feel the touch
Of unseen forces, wings that hover nigh,
Protecting these who put their trust in them,
And praise His name from every twisted stem."
