Says Dominions Need New Planes

WELLINGTON, N.Z., April 15 (CP)—A warning against continuing to use obsolete aircraft in Dominion air forces has been given by Air Marshal Sir Keith Park, noted British leader of the Battle of Britain and the defence of Malta, who has arrived to live in New Zealand on his retirement from the Royal Air Force.

"Some of the Dominions—and some of the larger Dominions too—are making a brave display on paper with air equipment that is not the best," he said. "They give themselves and the rest of the Empire quite a false sense of security. They are mounting their magnificent pilots on a lot of old junk. "It is not even good training to mount young men on obsolete aircraft and to train the air force organization in outdated equipment. It would be far better to have a small force mounted in jet fighters and otherwise handling fully modern equipment."

Urges Recreation To Combat Crime

(By The Canadian Press) WINNIPEG, April 15—Promotion of healthful recreation and stimulation of sports activities for the youth of the country is advocated by Thomas J. Keen, former deputy superintendent of Headingly jail, as a "sure-fire" antidote in the battle against crime. "It is remarkable how few of those in Headingly jail have any active interest in sport," he said. "If they had spent more time in such activities they would probably not have ended up in prison. Since he first entered the service as a prison guard 32 years ago, Mr. Keen has witnessed progressive improvement in prison conditions. The advance has been particularly noticeable, he said, in the higher standard of food provided, along with better library and recreational facilities. "Today the men are allowed to listen to radio programs, broadcast through the wards by a public address system. Broadcasts of swing music, hockey games and prize fights are the big favorites."

THREE FOR EGYPT

B, Violet M. Methley Continued from page 2 tion or pack of fierce dogs, no inhabitants except during the brief visits of nomads to water their flocks. The only building was a small white-washed shrine, domed like a magnified puffball. It had once been the dwelling and now was the tomb of a Moslem hermit-ascetic, whose bones cold still be seen through a grating in the wall. This shrine made the tiny oasis a sacred spot to the local native tribes and wandering Bedaween; to them, in consequence, it was more than a mere watering place for their goats and camels. In spite of herself and notwithstanding her anger at the way in which she had been treated, Kay felt the peace of that green place when she woke to the cooling of doves in the acacia bushes, the humming of wild bees among the sweet-smelling yellow blossoms. Daoud and the two men in charge of the supply lorry were preparing breakfast; presently the chauffeur brought her coffee, biscuits and dates, with a brass can of hot water. After washing and eating she felt better in body, but her mind seemed blank of plans. She could only stare out over the desert through the tent doorway, wondering how to escape across those sands which appeared as hard to navigate unseen as any ocean of waters. Perhaps she could persuade one of the servants to help her, though it seemed unlikely especially as she had no money with which to bribe them. Presently, Lovelace merged from the other small tent and sauntered towards her, cool and immaculate in his pale grey flannel suit. "Feeling better this morning?" he asked of Kay's averted profile, then, as she gave no answer, "So we're still not on speaking terms? What a pity as we shall be married here alone, indefinitely! Well, I can be patient, when I want anything." To-day his looks his voice, meant less than nothing to Kay. It was with a sense of almost fierce triumph and relief that she realized again the truth of what she had said to this man the night before. The old fascination was dead, killed at last and, as Kay knew now with certainty, forever, by a love that was real and living. "Living? The word brought back a thought which had been torturing her. A question to which she must learn the answer. She forced herself to speak, dry-lipped. "That pencil—how did you get it from—from Kit?" "Oh, dear no! It was always a bad habit of yours to look on the dark side of things, my dear girl. I heard that this admirer of yours had come to Abu Rameses and I couldn't contemplate a third person in our 'solitude a deux. So I sent my representative to prevent any such intrusion, and although he seems to have found some little difficulty about finding the right man, he succeeded eventually, after some sleuth work rather wasted in the wrong direction. So all was well that ended well!" "And your hired murderer came to give you his report and the booty!" (To Be Continued)
