The interior of the building is pretty badly gutted and the extent of the damage to the machinery can not be ascertained just at this time. The building and machinery were valued at $8000 and there is about $3000 insurance.

Special to The Guardian. SAN JOSE, Costa Rica, May 9.—The list of the dead at Cartago now numbers not less than fifteen hundred.

The city was destroyed by an earthquake which lasted four seconds and which was a tremendous movement, following several minor disturbances during the day, occurring at seven o'clock Wednesday evening.

The people had no time to escape from the homes which fell about them. All lines of communication were also destroyed and the city is still in darkness through the destruction of the lighting plant.

The panic-stricken populace fled in every direction, leaving hundreds buried under fallen buildings.

Not until the following day was the news of the catastrophe spread, and before assistance could be sent survivors had suffered terribly from exposure.

A Silesian College fell while the priests and children were at prayers, twelve being killed.

The earthquake brought almost total darkness and great clouds of dust followed, by roaring sounds deep down in the earth which continued six hours.

No worse disaster ever occurred in the history of Costa Rica.

President Gonzalez is personally directing the work of rescue, but little prospect that any buried under the ruins will escape.

Different reports place the number of wounded at several thousands.
