Sunglo Fox Breeders Club Field Day

There was a very large attendance of foxmen at the Field Day of the Sunglo Fox Breeders Club. Ranches visited were L. W. Hancock's, J. Wilfred Lecky, Bedouque, Stewart and Lewis Ranch and The Experimental Fox Ranch.

Very interesting discussions took place at each place in regard to feeding, etc. In the evening an excellent supper at the Capitol Tea Rooms made a fitting climax to a very profitable day.

At Mr. Hancock's ranch foxes were viewed as being raised on rations containing fresh meat versus other full litter brothers and sisters fed on rations containing only dehydrated meats. Also an experiment of similar design, where fat pig pups were fed on rations containing milk and half containing no milk.

Four generations of sires were exhibited showing transmission of the size character. Males measuring up to 47 1-2 inches from tip to tip were shown to carry through the four generations. A demonstration of character of finish which has to do with thickness of guard and quantity of hair showing this character to be transmitted from a line bred dog, through two generations very distinctly.

Size pups as a result of two crosses of inbreeding were exhibited, and showed there was no decrease in size or in quality or size of litter.

GOVERNMENT

The Ranch of Stewart and Lewis was visited in the afternoon, where examples of close line breeding and inbreeding were displayed showing outstanding individuals, of large size, and others of small size, depending on the ancestors used in such work. This ranch demonstrated what can be accomplished by close study and careful matings.

From here the Experimental Farm was visited, where Dr. G. Erniss Smith displayed many duct foxes and pups, as being fed on different rations, and as being bred from several different types and crosses of strains and families. Poor foxes were used in the experiments as well as good ones, showing what can be accomplished through more selection on the part of the rancher.

Death Yesterday Of Lord Carson

Lord Carson's first wife died in 1913, leaving him two sons and three daughters. The next year he married Ruby Frewen. They had one son.

(By Thomas T. Champion) (Canadian Press Staff Correspondent)
LONDON, Oct. 22—A sketch of the life of Lord Carson naturally divides itself into two parts—his career as a lawyer, and his career as a politician. The late Lord Birkenhead, no mean value of a man's talents in the law, once described Carson as the greatest figure at the Bar since Erskine. The main facts of Carson's career as a politician are well known and the opinions held concerning them are clean-cut, but it might be ventured here that he had a following in the north of Ireland and in England which over a long space of years was almost fanatical in allegiance to his leadership. And there were thousands on his own nature—simple direct, fervid, too, in upholding "constitutional methods" who proclaimed themselves cheerfully anxious to behold Carson in sinister association with the nearest lamp-post.

Perhaps the most extraordinary thing of all, to those who know little or nothing of the Irish, was Carson's popularity with his political enemies. He was never unpopular with the Irish Nationalists, and was almost popular with the Sinn Feiners, wrote Lord Birkenhead. "I think his success particularly on his political side, was not so largely an intellectual success as a character success," declared Rt. Hon. Sir James O'Connor. "His speeches and conduct were the result of his own nature—simple direct, honest. He was a political success because he was not a politician at all. Finesse was not in his armoury." And that other lovable old Nationalist, the late "Tay Pay" O'Connor once said of Carson: "I am not sure he was ever an enemy to Home Rule, infatuated or otherwise. I thought Carson was a most dangerous politician. He played a most dangerous part at a most critical moment."

Edward Henry Carson belonged to a very old family of south of Ireland Protestants, and was born on Feb. 9, 1854. His father, Edward Henry Carson of Dublin, was at one time vice-president of the Institute of Auctioneers. His mother was Isabella, daughter of Captain Lambert of County Galway. Carson's education was gained in Dublin, where he went to famous Trinity College. One of his fellow students there was that unhappy genius, Oscar Wilde, who was destined for a grim encounter with Carson years later. His studies at Trinity completed, Carson went to the Irish Bar, and his companions on the Leinster circuit was another struggling young barrister, by name John Redmond. Carson had no money and no influence. Stories went around the Bar Mess how Carson in those days used to receive briefs on behalf of land-dwellers marked with a fee as low as ten shillings. "And if ye bring woff off there'll be an extra five shillings for ye," more than one country attorney is said to have assured him.

Carson's abilities as a pleader were soon recognized. He became a K. C., and ultimately solicitor-general for Ireland. That happened in what was known as "the reign of Blood Balfour," when the late Lord Balfour was solicitor-general, and attempted to suppress with an iron hand what the law deemed to have presented its problems to Mr. King. By custom each province has come to expect a representative in the Dominion cabinet. From the Province of Quebec a number of French-speaking ministers must be selected and the English-speaking Protestant population of Quebec has been represented in almost all governments. Similarly the English-speaking Catholic population of Ontario has been represented in all recent governments.

Ontario's English-speaking Catholic representative in the last Liberal administration was Hon. Peter Heenan who is now a member of the Ontario Government and out of the running for secretary. A former Premier for South Renfrew, has been mentioned as his successor and is one of the prominent Liberals who gathered in Ottawa today.

C. B. Howard, veteran Member for Sherbrooke, was also in Ottawa today and has been mentioned as a possible representative of the English-speaking Quebec group. Another prospect for this post is C. G. Power whose service as chairman of the Pensions Committee of the House of Commons six years ago has led to his being linked with the portfolio of pensions and national health.

practice at the Bar. "It was the bitterest moment of my life," he said. "I went to my room and locked the door for fear anyone should come in. I began to cry. I went home, threw myself on the bed, and had another cry. And so I was promoted to the dignity of a peer."

A useful item of legislation which Carson introduced in the lords and was passed by both houses, was the money-lenders' bill under which money-lenders were prohibited from sending circulars by mail and are otherwise restricted. He resigned as lord of appeal in 1929 and received a pension of £18,750. He was a bencher of the King's Inns, Dublin, and of the Middle Temple, London.

Lord Carson in 1879 married Sarah Annette Foster, by whom he had two sons and two daughters. She died in 1913 and in the following year he married Ruby Frewen, and they had one son. His eldest boy by his first marriage died in 1880, having been a farmer in South Africa and having seen service in the Great War.
