Unexpected difficulties with the loading ramps at the terminals of Wood Islands, P.E.I., and Cariboo, N.S., has caused a further delay in putting the car ferry "Prince Nova" on her scheduled crossings Yesterday the craft left Charlottetown early in the afternoon and after a two and one-half hour run arrived at Wood Islands where she was met by engineers of the Federal Department of Public Works. The engineers went from the city by car and attempted to put the automobile on the ferry for the return trip.

However, when this was tried it was found that at low tide the loading ramp on the pier would not lower itself on the deck of the Prince Nova. There was a drop of several feet between the end of the ramp and the deck of the boat. At medium or high tide the situation would be undesirable also as the end of the ramp is about 17 inches thick leaving quite a "bump" for cars to go over. On top of this the inner end of the ramp presented other difficulties. It appears it is hitched to a concrete block which is higher than the road leading up to it. Trucks going up would be obliged to crawl up this incline and then descend the sloping ramp to the boat. This would leave them stranded on the centre of the block.
