Tax Rate Cut In This Town

MOUNT FOREST, Que., April 6.—(A.P.)—Among the Quebec municipalities that have maintained balanced budgets through the difficult years of the current economic depression is the Town of Mount Royal, a suburb of Montreal. Mayor

T. S. Darling of that municipality is not only in a position this year to announce a balanced budget but also a reduction in the tax rate from 12 to 11 mills. Revenue for the year is estimated at $100,833 against estimated expenditure of $98,963. The estimated surplus and the tax rate reduction have been made possible, Mayor Darling said, through reducing the town's expenditures on non-essentials and keeping maintenance costs to a minimum. In its 21 years of existence Mount Royal has not wasted much money on election costs. Mayor Darling has been elected by acclamation for 21 consecutive one-year terms.

McGill Summer School

MONTREAL, April 6.—(C.P.)—Announcement that the summer courses to be given this year at McGill University Medical School would cover regular clinical work and surgery but would not carry credit towards a degree, disposes of reports the degree course would be shortened by means of these additional courses. The present course runs from seven to nine years with at least one year as hospital interne after graduation.

SWEDISH BANKER TO RETIRE

STOCKHOLM, Sweden, April 6.—(G.P.)—After eminent service in the management of the Skandinaviska Kreditaktiebolaget extending over a period of 20 years the managing director of that large bank, Hofer Lauritzen, has announced his intention to retire. He will be succeeded by the present managing director of the Malmoe Branch of the Skandinaviska, E. Herslow, a man with extensive industrial and financial experience.

Mr. Lauritzen, whose great ability as an executive and banker is widely recognized, had the intention to retire earlier but postponed that step until he had steered his bank through the complex and difficult problems caused by the crisis into smoother waters, a task which he has now successfully accomplished.

SWEET VANITY

RICHARD GOYNE

"Cynthia, this is our play," he protested, eagerly. "I want to try this scene first with you. Just you. When a fellow's done his best to produce something really worthy of you—"

Flattery it was yet subtly veiled, put so earnestly that she had not the heart to refuse.

There followed a half hour of intense and earnest rehearsal, at the end of which Cynthia, caught up into the spirit of the thing, was as enthusiastic as himself.

"Well, Dicky, you'll be famous as a playwright if you go on like this," she cried. "It really is splendid. The situations are so ingenious that you know half this scene by heart already."

Dicky nodded. He had reckoned, too, on Cynthia's abnormal quickness in picking up a part. He glanced at his watch, experiencing a thrill of satisfaction as he noted what time it was.

"Let's try to run through it, then," he ventured, but Cynthia had also thought of time. A clock outside struck once, and she started.

"My dear, it's one o'clock in the morning. We must fly!" His disappointment was not feigned.

"Just once more, Cynthia. Be a darling." She hesitated, as she saw the light in his eyes, and then shrugged.
