MOTHER KNOWS BEST!

The Harvey Girls

By Samuel Hopkins Adams

"Emergencies are our regular business." This aphorism of Fred Harvey's, placarded on the wall of the service way, was accepted as a major tenet of the Harvey working system. Sometimes, owing to derangement of railroad schedule, one hungry train would follow on the heels of another. Accidents or blockades would temporarily shut off the supply of food. Upon each Harvey House was laid the responsibility of meeting these problems with no letdown in the standards of the service.

On a crisp December noon, Terry Kelsey picked up a code message which puzzled him. He brought it straight to Manager Bell who called in Miss Bliss. They read: "Big box sardines arriving Train 3 tomorrow. Special."

"Big," preceding any article of food, meant a brass collar. But "sardines," and "special"—they were out of the ordinary. "What do you make of it, Terry?" asked Dave Bell.

The Irishman scratched his red head. "I reckon it's a fish story. That Storke hombre took a drink and got funny." "Wait a minute," said Miss Bliss. "I think it's more than that. Sardines come from the other side of the water. I noticed in my New York paper last week that Mr. Harvey was returning from Europe. That's the answer."

Formidable stories were current as to the head man's keen eye for detail, his unremitting insistence upon the utmost perfection of service. Consequently, as the news spread, the whole little community was in a state of concert-pitch nerves. No train in any station ever got a higher degree of service than the morrow's No. 3. But there was no sign of the Big Boss.

Naturally there followed a slight relaxation of the staff, a slight relaxation of the head man's table, a still nervous head waitress almost imperceptibly cracked the handle of a teacup. As she had already reported several breakages within the past few days, she decided to say nothing about so microscopic a blemish.

Whereupon there dropped, unheralded, from a way freight, a slender bearded, erect man in somber black, who stroled into the luncheon and immediately discovered a broken toothpick in the center of the prowl. Next he called attention to a rusted link on the chain lamp. In the dining room, whither the staff, hastily summoned, stood to attention, he strode, as if directed by unerring fate itself, to the imperfect cup. Picking it up, he felt in his vest pocket and brought out the offending toothpick. "Call in the rest of the help, Mr. Bell," he directed.

The staff assembled with still apprehension. Fred Harvey held up before them the wood in one hand, the china in the other. He looked from one to the other, realistically. "I have heard good reports of Sandrock," he said. "They are not borne out by this. You are not up to Harvey standards." His expression became grave. "You have heard of the rigorous tradition of the theatre. The show must go on. That is the honor of the profession. We, too, have our tradition and our honor. The trains must be fed. Folks must eat. And in the houses that bear my name, they must eat the best and have the best of service. If I thought that any other restaurant were doing better, I should close every Harvey House and go out of business."

His face relaxed, became almost benign. "Our primary business is food," he continued. "We have done our duty by other things when we have fed them. But toward the new and developing country into which we came, we have a further responsibility. I should like to think that every Harvey House will become a local institution and use its influence for progress and decency. I hear that you gave an entertainment the other night; that it was a success. I approve of that. Repeat it. There you identify us with the community. Some of you young ladies"—he smiled about him mysteriously—"will stay here and grow up with this wonderful country. You will be the wives and mothers of a new and developing West, and—now his eyes actually twinkled—

"perhaps the founders of a Harvey aristocracy, wish you all happiness and good fortune. I placed the toothpick in the cup, walked to the window and dropped both out."

Manager Bell followed him out of the door. "Judge Ezra Purvis would like you to join him at the Albemarle for a drink, sir."

"Who is Judge Ezra Purvis?" "The local political boss. He's just been appointed to the bench. It's a matter of business, he says."

"Tell Judge Purvis that I will be glad to have him join me in the luncheon in five minutes or at his convenience."

To the envy of her fellows, Alma was deputed to attend upon the wants of the head man. These were simple. He ordered a pitcher of milk and crullers.

Judge Purvis arrived with Bell, smiling and affable, and shook hands warmly with the restaurant man. He began to speak persuasively. Fred Harvey sat, grave and passive. It struck Alma, unobtrusively listening in, with a shock, that he was trying to buy the place from Mr. Harvey. She heard his voice rise. "I'll do better than that, Mr. Harvey. I'll throw in my two claims on the east slope of Gurney Ridge. Copper streaks, standing out plain. Right along the mountainside. Rich with it, sir! Green with it. Green as the grass in your own front yard."

From the quiet smile on Mr. Harvey's countenance, his employee hazarded a guess (possibly unwarranted) at an inner reply, "I'm not."

Some sort of refusal there must have been, for the unobtrusive tone of his voice, with a slight of exasperation now. "Would you consider a partnership, then, Mr. Harvey? I could be a lot of use, locally and politically." Then with heavier significance, "I could save you a lot of trouble, if you know what I mean, sir."

Alma could not hear the reply. As the men parted, the Judge still maintained his genial expression. But there was an effect of effort about it.

ELLEN'S DIARY

The sun shone brilliantly that afternoon and I can recall that the blossoms were unfolding on the branches of the russet trees in the orchard covering them in a beautiful pinky-white cloud of bloom. There was a hum of bees there, a lazy summery drone and in the garden beside the onions were up in a row, and the peas and radishes and lettuce in dark and lighter green. And on the lawn the dahlias were appearing in a line of slim shoots beside the driveway. I remember stooping down to inspect these more closely and wondering at the time what colors would adorn them, in time, when close by, I heard the car being taken out of the garage.

"Tim laughed about it at supper. 'You know, Ellen,' he said, 'you should give us some credit. We lasted, till, well, all morning and almost all afternoon, which when you understand it, wasn't too bad. And I'm telling you, if we hadn't gone to get some tobacco, it would have been just too bad. You wouldn't have had any turns this year, for we wouldn't have had that manure spread before it was time to get at the having. That's the truth of it, now isn't it James?' And James offered, 'It wouldn't have been so bad neither if the corner store hadn't been out of it, and we had to go farther.' And Tim chuckled, 'and we were in such a hurry, or our heads weren't as clear as they should have been, or at any rate, we left the emergency brake on, never thought of it till we got back to the yard!' 'I guess giving up tobacco is easier said than done,' I commented, 'the best way is never to commence the habit.' But Tim was sure 'there's nothing to it, Ellen, only,' and I was glad the small fellows had already gone back to their play, 'we picked out

Certainly for a wife to live in a house with a husband who hates her and who will not even speak to her must keep her continually stirred up and infuriated. That sort of situation will wreck any woman in body and soul.
