The Old Order Changes

By DAVID LYALL

"Not one."
"But there are other ways," observed Freeland slowly, thinking perhaps of the far-back days of his own courtship, when he had found it very difficult for an unknown young Scotchman to make headway.

"I tell you I hadn't an idea. Besides, it's ridiculous. He's too old, and I'm sure I don't know why he wanted to come bothering me and especially telling mother. She'll never let it down on me, I know."

"It pleased her very much, Mary. She says he behaved like a perfect gentleman."

"Why, of course, he is one; but, oh, father, I could have done without it."

"I believe that you've seen him the day, then?"

"Yes, at the dinner hour on the meads. What a time and place! I was sorry for him all the same, but how could I help it? Don't you think life gets all muddled up sometimes, hopelessly muddled up?"

"It does that, but ye bide a wee and dinna weary, it straightens again, lass; you take it from me," said Freeland quietly. "I'm sorry for him, too, but at the same time, I'm glad he's not so late for me, if you like."

It was a queer, revealing moment—Mary's glorified face was hidden just for a moment on her father's rather awkwardly. The next moment she was gone. She would not have been her father's daughter had she not stood up gallantly to the offensive and no doubt, it was better to get it over at once.

When she marched into the dining-room, her mother was alone putting some fresh ribbons on an exquisite robin's egg blue into Bee's camisoles. She looked up with a certain archness, which had a peculiarly irritating effect.

"I suppose you've had tea; and I was getting a little bit anxious about you and yet I wasn't. Have you anything to tell me, dear?"

"Nothing," answered Mary shortly. "I went along to see Mrs. Disney, and finding her in a muddle, stopped and cleared up a bit for her, and had tea in the process."

"I'm afraid she's a bad manager," said Mrs. Freeland coolly. "When I hear of her she's always in some muddle or another."

"She has five infants, no help, and a frail body, mother. If there are really any haloes going on the other side, Hope Disney will need a very big and gaudy one to help her to forget the worries of this lower sphere."

It was a flippant speech for Mary to make, for she had much reverence inherited from the godly Freelands, for sacred things. But there was something too provocative about her mother that evening, something which raised the devil in her. It even frightened her as one might feel afraid, suddenly seeing a chasm yawning in some dear, familiar place. Mrs. Freeland, less sensitive than her daughter, took no offence, however, but folding her plump, complacent hands on her knee, prepared for ample discussion of the momentous theme which had occupied her whole thoughts since noon. In imagination already she had furnished Little Heath or some other and more important rectory anew, beheld Mary dispensing parish benefits, arrived at terms of intimacy with the irreproachable family of the Sevens.

But Mary, on her own initiative, presently rang the curtain down on the pleasing picture.

"Mother, I want to tell you," she is — Santa Claus will arrive here Thursday morning and meet the small Kiddies accompanied by their parents in Holman's Toyland, Charlottetown, from 11 to 12 o'clock and the School Children from 3 to 4 o'clock. He had a very difficult time getting through. With snow so scarce he had to abandon his Reindeer and sleighs and finish the journey by train. He was very glad to hear that Holman's had the toys all ready and wants to meet the Kiddies Thursday.

Holman's Latest Toyland News

"I am aware of it, my dear," said her mother smoothly. "He came here to tell me and to ask permission like the complete gentleman he is."

"I was very much surprised, because I hadn't an idea he felt like that. I have refused him, mother, quite definitely and he understands. Will you be so very kind as not to talk about it ever—I couldn't bear it, really?"

"Oh, but Mary—I'm sure you have been premature, or, at least, precipitate, that is the word I meant to use," cried Mrs. Freeland, thoroughly roused and ready for the usual war of words concerning anything on which she had set her heart. "Have you considered? He is a splendid man, not old at all, only forty-three, so handsome and courtly, and so well off, and such nice people."

Mary's lips suddenly twisted into the same kind of smile her father sometimes showed when at the end of his tether.

"Did he array all his goods in his front window like that, mother? I've known him a long time and I simply can't believe it. Anyhow, I'm not going to marry him. No, I can't talk about it, and if he hadn't come here to-day nobody would ever have known of it from me. I hope to goodness you won't tell anybody."

She added in a dismayed voice, suddenly picturing the Canon's offer of marriage as the topic of tea-table talk when the St. Barnabas set came in on "at-home" days.

Mrs. Freeland's deep disappointment betrayed itself in her rasping voice and injured air.

"The Canon apparently thinks very highly of you. He has seen only one side, the side you keep for outsiders; if he knew how lacking in respect for me you often are—"

"Oh, mother, I hope not. But I'm twenty-six; don't you see, and can't go on being herded all one's days. One grows up and wants to have a free hand in the arranging of one's life; that is why I want to stop in Mardocks. Can't I stop yet? I'm sure the new Squire would let me if I explained the circumstances."

"I have no patience with you, Mary; you don't get sense as you grow older, but only queer, confused notions. I never met anyone so

TOYLAND IS KIDDIES JOYLAND

Holman's Toyland is the kiddies Joyland. These are wonderful days for the Kiddies, how their faces brighten at the sight of thousands of toys as they enter Toyland. Then Thursday there's the big attraction of Santa Claus' visit—won't that be wonderful. You grown up folk know something of disappointments—well the Kiddies mind it even more. We are trying to get the message of Santa Claus across so the Kiddies at least won't be disappointed Christmas morning.

Come then any time and bring the Children to Toyland you'll both have a good time.
