Matt. 9:35-10:15, 40, 42.
GOLDEN TEXT.
"Freely ye have received, freely give."—Matt. 10:18.

POINTED SUGGESTIONS.

By Rev. D. W. Snider.

It is the men who are most like Jesus in their Christian activities and compassion who see the ever-widening and ever-ripening need. It is the vision of the interested and consecrated. The holy and the loving are always the disciples of a crisis. They cannot be complacent while there is the danger that the ripe field may soon be a rotting one.

Jesus is the model of the Sunday School teacher and Christian worker, as He undoubtedly is for the preacher. The scenes of the highway transform themselves forcefully to his understanding under the quick figure, which his sanctified imagination presents. Multitudes are thought of as shepherdless sheep, and the sheep as a field of ripening grain without harvesters at hand, and the owner of the field in desperate appeal to every possible harvest hand. The field the mission of Jesus is as wide and as inclusive of benefits to men today as it ever was. Religion and medicine are not antagonisms. Religion and hospitals and infirmaries and asylums and all manner of agencies and instruments for the help and healing of mankind belong to God. Those who labor in them should act under divine authority and ordination. They should exercise whatever might that authority gives or the power of prayer can grant. And as all true science belongs to God they should take toll of its every possibility of good.

Matthew the Publican and Simon the Cananaean, under ordinary circumstances would make strange bed-fellows. And they would dislike each other scarcely less than a lot of folk would like either of them. But Jesus can make (what a mercy that He does!) friends and brethren and fellow apostles of those who are natural enemies and haters.

Purpose and motive and expectation and possibility are provided for in the Master's outline of duty to those whom He sends forth in His name. He has a code of honor for them and definite rules of conduct. And what is to be the expectation of the prophet, should be esteemed as the privilege of the city to which

The homes of hospitality for the preacher—the homes with the prophet's chamber—the homes which gladly support the servant of the Lord, are homes where God's blessing abides. Duty is two-edged as between preacher and the people, and where duty is fulfilled on both sides there comes restfulness and great joy. Alas, that either the one or the other should come into Sodom or Gomorrah-like judgments.

The Master does not place, by many diameters of comparison, nearly as much value upon genius or brilliant gifts as He does upon faith. The faith which ministers to "one of these little ones" in the simplest act of devotion to the cause of the good, shall in no wise lose reward. And the reward is beyond specification. Some rewards may be foretold, but the reward of faith, while it is sure, is beyond, and too grand for, the telling.

There is no need to think the service one can render is of little or no value because it is not the service of those who are called to the "firing line" or to leadership. The reward which the prophet shall receive, for example, is also the reward of the one whose sympathy and love for the prophet is such that it involves some likeness to his character. "As his share is that goeth down to the hater so shall his share be that tarrieth by the stuff: they shall share alike."
