MISS BROWN OF X. Y. O.

By E. Phillips Oppenheim (Copyright 1927 by E. Phillips Oppenheim)

(CONCLUDED)

SOON they left the great open stretches of heath starred with yellow gorse, and passed into what seemed to be an older world, quarter villages with small, thatched roofed houses in the garden of which hollyhocks and roses were making a struggling appearance.

The region of straight roads was ended. They curled and twisted over fir-clad ridges and into shady hollows where the meadows on each side were rich with green herbage and here and there a wealth of primroses peered out from the moss-grown stone walls, or through the long grass of the weedy ditches. The breath of violets came to them from many places beneath the hedgerows facing southward, and Miss Brown gave a little sob of delight when she sheltered herself between two strips of woodland she saw a waving mist of faint purple, herald of coming bluebells.

Dessiter opened his eyes with a smile. "Fond of the country, Miss Brown?" he asked. "I was brought up in it," she reminded him. "No one who has ever lived in the real country can forget, and all around London is so difficult. The suburbs seem to reach forever."

He nodded understandingly. "It costs something in beauty," he remarked, "to own the greatest city in the world, if one can only travel so far as the buses go. Every season they extend, but so does the curse of villadom."

Presently the village—changed once again in character. The thatch was replaced by ancient red tiles. The faces of the cottages were plastered and incrustured with pebbles, the tangled waste of woodland gave way to scantily growing forests, and into the atmosphere there crept a faint taint of something, drawn far inland from the sea. Miss Brown took a deep breath and sat a little more upright.

"Are we getting near the coast?" she asked, in an awed tone. "Not far off," he answered. "He too was sitting upright now. They passed a reduced speed through a village where the stone-fronted houses were covered with creepers and where the ivy-grown church with its squat tower seemed to have been standing from time immemorial. A few people started about as they passed curiously. Once a hat was hurriedly raised, and once an old man stopped in his leisurely progress and, leaning upon his stick, stood looking after them as one might look at a ghost. Presently the speed of the car was slackened and the engine almost stopped before some massive iron gates. There was a lodge on either side, a great coat of arms in the middle, gardens ablaze with yellow crocuses.

As they slowed down the gates were opened, and a woman who fully furnished in the earlier Georgian fashion, and with many vases filled with flowers. There were high French windows, and Miss Brown gave a little stifled cry as below, beyond the limits of the pleasure, she saw sandy spits and shifting estuaries leading out into a long peninsula, and then the breakers, and beyond the sea. The footman who had followed them threw open the windows and a little breath of its saltiness seemed to creep in.

"Tea shall be served immediately, sir," the older servant announced, as he left them. Miss Brown had lost all her pretty color; she was, in fact, almost pale.

"You—you haven't asked for your friend," she reminded her companion. "Plenty of time. He'll turn up all right."

"But what a wonderful place!" she gasped, looking out at the garden, the cedar trees on the lawn, the hedge leading to the walled garden, the ringed meadow, starred with primroses on one side, the flush of bluebells in the spinney.

"Come out and have a look at it," he invited. He led her along the flagged stone walk, on each side of which were prim rows of crocuses, up a few steps into a little summer house, steps to face seaward. Below them,

In Memoriam

MRS. JOHN GARNHUM.

The death occurred at Burlington on Sunday, April 1st, of Hannah, widow of the late John Garnhum, aged 79 years. Deceased for some time previous to her death had not been in the best of health, but was able to perform her duties in the usual manner. On March 23rd, she was suddenly stricken with paralysis of the brain, and despite the kind and loving care of neighbors, relatives and friends, she passed peacefully to her eternal rest. All who had the privilege of her acquaintance ever found her a true friend and kind neighbor.

The funeral which was held from the residence of her son, John M. Garnhum, 226 Cumberland St., was largely attended. The Rev. E. H. Ramsay, D.D., officiated. Two favorite hymns of the deceased, "Abide With Me," and "Jesus Lover of My Soul," were sung during the service. Six grandsons, namely, Brenton, Edward, Vernon, Dennis and John Garnhum, of Charlottetown, and Brenton Garnhum, of Amherst, N. S., acted as pall-bearers.

Her husband, one of our laughter and one son preceded her some years ago. There are left to mourn the loss of a kind and loving mother, five sons, Brenton, J. L., George C., John M., of this city; Charles, of Lynn, Mass., and Daniel M., of Adams, N.S.; also one sister, Mrs. Jas. Adams, of Burlington. The sympathy of a large number of friends goes out to the bereaved, who are comforted by the fact that she is now beyond all earthly cares and sorrows, and reaping the reward of a life of Christian service.

MR. CHESTER D. McDONALD

On March 28th, 1928, the people in the community of Glasgow Road and surrounding vicinities were horribly shocked when the sad news spread of the instant death of Mr. Chester McDonald, of that place, while operating a circular saw. The sudden and untimely death of a young man in the prime and vigor of life causes more than a passing sigh in the hearts and minds of his large acquaintance.

At his death he was 32 years of age, and leaves to mourn their irreparable loss his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Norman McDonald, a young widow (nee Miss Lois McRae) and two brothers and five sisters, John D. Bradabane, Alfred K. at home; Mrs. Nelson Stead, Hunter River; Mrs. Geo. Matheson, Wheatley River; Mrs. Herbert Matheson, Milton; Mrs. Lemuel A. McKinnon, Highfield, and Mrs. George Ware, Alta. Services at the home and at St. John's Church, Milton, were conducted by Rev. Mr. Johnson. Hymns chosen for the service were "Nearer My God to Thee," "The Lord is My Shepherd," "Peace, Perfect Peace," and "God Moves in a Mysterious Way." Pall-bearers were Messrs. Earle Coles, Frank Roberts, William Ford, West McDonald, Stanley Houston and Frank McRae.
