Quebec Honors Bill Defender

QUEBEC, Sept. 9.—(By The Canadian Press)—Ten years ago Quebec province paid generous tribute to her chief justice and one-time foremost criminal lawyer, Sir Francois Xavier Lemieux, on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of his admittance to the bar. A decade has passed. Again Quebec prepares to fetter her distinguished son, defender of the rebel Riel. In the Autumn the 81 year old chief justice observes his diamond jubilee as a legal figure, the 35th anniversary of his elevation to the bench.

For 21 years Sir Francois has been chief justice of the Supreme Court. On the bench he is an impressive figure with his massive head, stern and impassive features. His firm grasp of legal issues, absolute surety of his own status, his incisive rulings and masterly summing-up and a winning personality, have made him a great judge. His ready willingness to help young lawyers has made him immensely popular amongst members of the bar.

As a lawyer, young Lemieux quickly distinguished himself especially as a pleader in criminal cases. During his quarter-century at the bar he was called in the defence of most of the important criminal cases of the day. His brilliant rebuttal of evidence, searching cross-examination, his great eloquence and knowledge of the law were the attributes to his success.

It was his passionate effort to save the life of Louis Riel at Regina in 1885 that initiated Mr. Lemieux's great popularity amongst the people of his native province. In Quebec it was thought that if anyone could save the instigator of the Northwest rebellion it was Lemieux. The young lawyer volunteered his services and they were accepted enthusiastically. Associated in the defence with him were J. H. Greenfields of Montreal and another noted criminal lawyer from Quebec, Charles (afterwards Sir Charles) Fitzpatrick, who was to become a minister of justice of Canada and lieutenant-governor of Quebec. Pitted against this eminent trio as crown attorney was James (later Sir James) Aitkens, K. C., who afterwards became lieutenant-governor of Manitoba and Sir Francois Lemieux's greatest friend.

The crown called its case. In September the half-breed Riel was found guilty; in November he was hanged. Back in Quebec storm clouds were gathering. Addressing a mass meeting on the Champ de Mars, Montreal, could be seen the level-headed Laurier, passionately denouncing the way in which the government had handled the uprising of the Metis.

In this repudiation to Riel's death, Lemieux played a prominent part. A keen fighter, a brilliant speaker, he fought hard for the Liberal-minded Nationalists. Already a member of the legislature, he was returned by a comfortable margin in the Mercier landslide of 1886.

Forty-four years after Riel's execution, in 1929, Sir Francois knelt before the rebel leader's tomb in the cemetery at St. Boniface. His long white hair flowing in the wind, silver and glistening in the sun, the chief justice prayed for the repose of Riel's soul.

"I prayed for his soul, and I prayed for justice for him who gave his life for his fellow-countrymen—I defended him," he announced.

A few years passed. The storm was over but another was brewing. Nationalism in Quebec had toned down to Liberalism. Sir John MacDona'd, the old chief, was dead. The Conservative party which had ruled Canada, with the exception of five years, since Confederation, was tottering. Liberals assailed alleged corruption in the Dominion administration. Then, in 1892, as a bolt from the blue, the firmly entrenched Liberal government of Honore Mercier was dismissed by the lieutenant governor. Mercier was brought before a Royal Commission, charged with having accepted public monies appropriated for a railroad.

Again to the front came lawyer Lemieux, ready to defend his chief. Again associated with him was Charles Fitzpatrick. Mercier was acquitted.

Mr. Lemieux's popularity continued. In 1896 as lieutenant-governor of the bar of the province, he entertained the Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Russell of Killowen. He was returned to the legislature for Bonaventure succeeding former Premier Mercier and in 1897 carried two constituencies, Bonaventure and Levis, where he was born. That year he was elevated to the bench. He succeeded the late Chief Justice Langelier in 1911 and in 1915 was knighted.

Among the many cases Sir Francois heard as judge was Quebec's most celebrated murder trial, that of Rev. Adelaire Delorme, acquitted after three trials in 1924 on a charge of murdering his half-brother. In 1926 he was appointed chairman of the commission probing customs administration but resigned before all evidence had been taken. During the absence in Europe in 1925 of Hon. Marcellus Peroude Sir Francois became acting lieutenant-governor of Quebec.

Sir Francois's political career was always overshadowed by his legal achievements. His first attempt to enter the legislature was blocked by Israel Tarte who was to cross the path of Laurier many times in the years that followed. Sir Francois was first elected in 1883 and retained a seat in the assembly until appointed to the bench. The only legislation of note he sponsored was the much-discussed Crucifix Bill of 1887.

Sir Francois was the son of a farmer. He married Dianne Plamondon, daughter of his first law partner. Of this union were born six sons and six daughters.

French Cafe Life Disappearing

LONDON, Sept. 9.—If you want to get a good lunch in any little French town, inquire where the commercial travellers eat, and go there. The dining-room may be noisy, but you will get the best food. This has always been true, but it is more true than ever today; for the commercial traveller has become a motorist, who covers much longer distances than he used to do, and is hungrier at his dinner hour. The change in his habits has had another effect of a different kind. If he lunches well, he no longer wastes his time in cafes, and while there are plenty of Hotels du Commerce, the Cafes du Commerce have almost entirely disappeared. Their going marks the passage of an epoch. For a hundred years the Cafe du Commerce has been in literature, in journalism, and in political oratory—the type of the leisurely, cool, and rather old-fashioned resort where local partisans would spend the whole summer afternoons discussing the politics of the parish pump. They had their name because the voyageur de commerce would meet his customers there, and it really was there that business was done. It is no longer. Parish pump politics are still passionately discussed, but in political clubs, which are a recent growth, and not in the Cafe du Commerce. Cafe life is disappearing in the provinces, as it has almost disappeared already in Paris.

Not in View

"I'm sorry," said the diner who had hoped to get away with it, "but I haven't any money to pay for my meal."

"That's all right," said the cashier. "We'll write your name on the wall and you can pay the next time you come in."

"Don't do that. Everyone who comes in will see it."

"No, they won't. Your overcoat will be hanging over it."
