CAPT. F. T. PETERS A 6TH CANADIAN V. C.

Six Canadians have won the Victoria Cross in this war, though one of them, Capt. F. T. Peters, R.N., is recorded officially among the British winners of the awards, and his name is not found in Canadian records. A native of Prince Edward Island nephew of the late Hon. A. Peters, premier from 1901 to 1908, he was raised in the west but spent his adult life with the British navy.

Third Canadian to win the empire's highest award in this war, Capt. Peters commanded H.M.S. Walney, a former U.S. coast-guard cutter. He earned the V. C. by forcing the boom at Oran during the North African landings on Nov. 8, 1942. He was the only survivor among 17 men on the Walney's bridge during the action.

OIL SEARCH GOING WELL — With the exploratory oil well in Hillsboro Bay deeper than 7,800 feet the rock formation is "as expected" it was learned over the week-end. There is still no oil but officials connected with the project appear to be well satisfied with developments. Equipment at the site is capable of going two miles but it is hoped oil will be located before that depth is reached.

Lively Comedy Bows In At Capitol To-day

As a welcome change from the more serious dramatic screenfare which has come this way since the start of the war, Warner Bros.' "Make Your Own Bed," a sprightly comedy of nonsense starring Jack Carson, Jane Wyman and Irene Manning, opens to-day at the Capitol Theatre. Based on the current shortage in domestic help, the film goes gaily along its way, pointing out the many problems inherent in this situation and never once pretending to solve one of them.

Jack Carson, in his first comic starring part, plays Jerry Curtis, a would-be detective with more energy than intelligence whose search for the perfect crime ends, literally, in the soup. Jane Wyman is Susan, his long-suffering sweetheart, while Iren Manning is seen in one of the surprise roles (for her) of the season—that of a dizzy dame with not a song in her repertoire and not a thought in her head.

Souris Hospital Annual Meeting

The first annual meeting of the Souris Hospital heard from the chairman of the Board of Trustees, Roy C. McLean, a detailed account of what had been done by the trustees up to the present time.

Mr. McLean reported that since the inauguration of the campaign for funds an amount slightly in excess of $26,000.00 had been realized and that the contract price of the building — including plumbing, heating and wiring — was $34,066.00.

The meeting unanimously voted to put on another campaign for funds this fall in an effort to secure the balance required and also to assist in the purchase of equipment. The report revealed that the Prince County Hospital at Summerside had very generously donated their present X-ray machine to the Souris Hospital and that donations of certain other hospital equipment had been received from the Prince Edward Island Hospital.

Mention was also made of a generous unsolicited contribution from the St. Alexis Club of Boston. "We believe," the report concluded, "that with everyone cooperating as we have been, and with a little more if we can secure it, that we should aim at completing our new Hospital without too much indebtedness."

The Ladies' Auxiliary to the Hospital reported that it had raised approximately $850.00 since its formation only a few months ago and that in addition to this amount in cash a large quantity of wool had been received from which blankets were to be made. The excellent work done by the ladies in this connection was commented upon by the meeting.

A managing committee, comprising representatives from the various school districts to be served by the hospital, was appointed for the year 1944-45.

Coldwell Outlines Post-War Policies

OTTAWA, Aug. 5 — (CP) —M. J. Coldwell, CCF leader, speaking in the External Affairs debate in the Commons, today outlined steps which he said would promote an expanding world economy, grounded on social justice and dedicated to lasting peace.

These steps included:—

1. No parleys with the German Junker class generals but "we must treat with representatives of German reborn trade unions, farm organizations and churches."

2. Provision of self-government for all peoples capable of ruling themselves and international supervision of backward peoples with a view to assisting them in their struggle for democratic self-determination.

3. Negotiations, under the auspices of the United Nations, for immediate settlement of the Indian problem.

4. Establishment of an international organization resting on a world-wide foundation of social and economic justice and democratically representative of all peoples —great and small.

5. Abolition of national armaments and their pooling in an international police force.

6. Planned use of economic resources to raise living standards through the world and eliminate insecurity, poverty and exploitation.

7. Renunciation by Canada of the idea of a commonwealth power bloc, but the use of avenues open to British nations in the ways of co-operative endeavor.

8. Conclusion of a treaty of co-operation and non-aggression with the Soviet Union.

9. Establishment of Canadian membership in the Pan-American Union.

10. Abolition of all national air forces and the setting up of a super-national air force to enforce world security while an international civil airways authority would rule commercial aviation.

intelligent men I know but you are dumb where I am concerned. Can't you understand that I don't love you, never will love you? Won't you stop proposing to me every time you see me?"

His lips stiffened in a stubborn line, relaxed into a forced smile. "As that fat woman said this afternoon, 'Constant chipping will wear away stone.' I won't stop trying to make you love me till you're married to another man."

Joan met the ardent gleam in his eyes and knew that he was speaking the truth. "How can I get rid of him, how can I?" she demanded of herself. Once she had asked her father that question and he had answered. "Tell him that you're in love. That will convince him."

That wouldn't do any good. Jerry had said he wouldn't give up until she was married. Why not tell him she was engaged? It wasn't marriage but it might help. With sudden determination, she confided,

"Then you'd better strap on your parachute, Jerry. You're on the verge of a crack-up. I'm engaged."

"Who is he?"

His voice was rough. He gripped her hands with a force that cut the star-sapphire ring into her finger.

"I shan't tell you his name yet, Jerry. Mother and father will announce my engagement formally at the proper time."

She saw his white, stunned face. Her eyes were dreamy with simulated rapture as she exulted:

"Jerry, he's wonderful! He's tall and straight and dark and terribly good-looking, he's making his mark in politics, and when I'm with him I think, as Saint somebody or other said, 'Nothing is so strong as gentleness. Nothing so gentle as real strength'."

Jerry Slade regarded her with eyes on fire.

"I recognize him. I don't have to wait for your father and mother to announce the engagement. It's that advertising man, Lamont,' he declared vehemently.

"Did I hear my name?" inquired a voice. From the lawn Craig Lamont pulled himself to the porch rail and perched beside Joan. "Hope you were saying something nice about the absent."

Slade scowled at him with tragic eyes.

"I'll say it was something nice. Joan was telling me she was engaged to you." He looked at the horrified girl. "I said I wouldn't give up until you were married, darling, and believe it or not, I won't," he flung at her and turned on his heel.

"Jerry! Come back! You know—" Craig Lamont caught her arm.

"Just a minute, Joan. What's it all about? Slade congratulates me on my engagement to you and you look as terrified as if you were being accused of murder. Would it be such a bad break to be engaged to me?"

The low vehemence of his voice beat against her heart. She stepped out of the seductive shadow into bright moonlight away from the voice. Explained breathlessly,

"It's a mistake, really it is. I—I — Jerry Slade won't believe that I don't love him; never will love him. He said he wouldn't stop proposing to me until I was married. And then — and then—"

"Take your time, adorable," Craig Lamont came close and brushed back a lock of her chestnut hair. "And don't be frightened."

"I'm not frightened, I'm not," Joan protested hotly. "I'm furious with myself. It was so stupid of me and I loathe being stupid. I told Jerry that I was engaged and then my imagination gnawed its rope—it's good when it gets a start—and I described a man and — and he jumped to the conclusion that it was you. As if there isn't more than one man in the world tall and straight and dark and terribly good-looking, who is making his mark in politics."

"I see. And you didn't mean me?" There was a disturbing note of laughter in his low voice.

Truman Family Portrait

Meet Democrat's Choice for Nation 's Second Family

By EVABETH MILLER
NEA Correspondent

Although Senator Harry S. Truman of Missouri won the Democratic nomination for the vice-presidency, the name of Wallace will still be in the running, for his wife was Bess Wallace before their marriage 25 years ago.

There is no kinship between Mrs. Truman and Vice President Henry A. Wallace's clan in Iowa, but the Senator's 20-year-old daughter, Margaret, says they'd be proud to claim relationships.

As a Vice President's wife, Mrs. Truman would undoubtedly remain exactly as she is now, and as she must have been as Bess Wallace during her girlhood in Independence, Mo.,—completely natural and unaffected, friendly and thoughtful. She puts people quickly at ease, laughs frequently, gestures to illustrate her remarks, has a simple dignity. Her blue eyes twinkle as she talks, and she dresses in a style as simple as her manner. Her white hair is short and simply done, combed into two soft curls at one side.

Capable And Cheerful

She looks like what she is — a nice, companionable mother for a college daughter and a capable, cheerful helpmate for a very busy man. You can tell this by the way she speaks with simple affection of her daughter: "She's a mighty nice girl, and we certainly enjoy her," and by the confident and unboasting pride with which she mentions her husband, the man who has made news by keeping an eagle eye on the government's war spending.

"I'm not very politically inclined," she said, "and we've never really discussed whether I would campaign with him if he were the nominee."

In Washington the three Trumans live in an apartment where Mrs. Truman does the cooking, since she has been maidless for months. Her husband, like most men, likes steak and potatoes best, when she can get the steak. But the watchful eye he keeps on government spending does not enforce rigid domestic economy, because "he thinks the housekeeping is my business,' she says.

No Time For Hobby

Besides housekeeping, Mrs. Truman is kept busy with work at a USO canteen, where she spends at least one day each week in helping to prepare and serve lunches. She spends a good deal of time with Margaret.

Mrs. Trueman insists she has no hobby, simply because she has never had time to develop one. She is an Episcopalean, and her husband belongs to the Baptist Church.

Summers, the three hurry back to Independence to stay in the home there that first belonged to Mrs. Truman's grandfather. Her father was in the government service in Kansas City. She went first to Independence schools and finished at Miss Barstow's private school in Kansas City, where her husband later was judge of the County Court. Her marriage took place in 1919 when 35-year-old Harry Truman returned from overseas as a Major in the army.

Mrs. Truman's mother is still living, and her presence at home is a special reason for the family's eagerness to return to Missouri each summer. Two of her brothers are in Independence, Frank managing a flour mill and George working with the highway department, while the third, Fred Wallace, is with the War Production Board in Denver.

When Margaret, the couple's only child, was first run in on family sessions with news photographers at her father's election to the Senate in 1935, she was only 11 years old. She hated the flash bulbs, and had to be talked into posing with her parents. Now at 20, she is a well poised, agreeable young woman, and jokes with the photographers. This fall she will be a junior at George Washington University in Washington, where she is majoring in history and radio. Very blonde and slender, closely resembling her father, she has an excellent soprano voice and will study this summer in Kansas City. Some day she hopes to sing professionally for radio. She debunks the convention press blurb about the family, which says that she has sung with the Denver Opera Company.

Sang In Chorus

"Why, I was just in the chorus because they were nice enough to let me practice a few times and then sing with them," she said in Chicago. "It was a lot of fun."

One convention incident is typical of Mrs. Truman. A small delegation of the press had to wait for her in a hotel corridor, and had been sitting on the floor to rest their weary bones. She was very much upset.

"Why, I feel just terrible about it," she said. "Someone should have been here to make you feel comfortable."

That's what she's like.
