CELEBRATED COMEDIAN SWINGS TO DRAMA

While any Joe E. Brown picture is an event in itself to millions of fans of all ages to whom the man with the capacious mouth has always been the No. 1 movie comedian, Joe's current appearance in the starring role of "The Tender Years" is winning a very special position in this season's film new. In this new Twentieth Century-Fox release, an Alton Production at the Capitol Theatre, a new and different Joe E. Brown is being presented to the world. To be sure, he still has the same facial characteristics. But in this picture—Joe's first in five years—he is a far cry from the boisterous, roistering comedian who had been for many years one of the great boxoffice draws of Hollywood. "The Tender Years" presents Brown in his first serious screen role—that of a small-town Protestant minister in a comparatively plain existence in a town where he sets out single-handed to right a wrong that is winked at by many respectable people of the community. Woven into the drama is a heart-warming story of the poignant relationship between a father and son, and of how, together, they find common ground in fighting an important battle. The role of Rev. William James Norris was out to order for Brown, who had been looking for just this kind of part for his return to the screen. Joe had played straight dramatic parts on the stage, but not on the screen. He had starred in "Elmer the Great" and "The Show Off." More recently, Producer Edward L. Alperson had seen Brown in the Pulitzer Prize play, "Harvey," and had seen him score a sensational hit in it, with an astonishing ten-month engagement in Chicago.
