THE STORY OF A WOMAN'S TRANSFORMATION
By Marion Rubincam

BUD
Chapter 26

"We're here Aunt Enid! Isn't it funny? Vi said turning to me as the passengers began gathering up wraps and baggage and filing out of the train.

We assembled all our belongings, and we had quite a few things. A trunkful was somewhere on the train—my old green trunk I possessed, a possession of my mother's, strong enough but rather curious looking nowadays. And we had a huge canvass suitcase a large cardboard box and several paper covered bundles. One bundle contained sandwiches, jam and several other things of the sort, put up by our Hartford friends for us to eat for lunch.

Vi's books, every bit of clothing we possessed, including things besides these a huge quilt was in the trunk.

"Wherever you'll be, you won't be warm enough this winter," Esther said as she helped us pack. Colored men were flying about calling "Porter, porter" and helping the other men with their suitcases. Two of them came up to us.

"Carry your things?" they asked. "Thank you," I said and let them shoulder all our possessions. "Aren't they polite?" Vi whispered. We followed them down the long platform and through the stone archway. Then she said aloud—for the first time, though the thought had been in her mind all along.

"Do you think Bud will be here? But she did not hear my answer. Her cheeks were burning, her eyes a blue blaze. She looked barely 15, her gold hair tucked up under her little round hat—an old one of Laura's retrimmed with ribbon from a dress. She wore a blue suit we had made at home during the summer, which then I thought quite grand.

Through the stone archway we went, past the ropes behind which was a line of people. Suddenly a young man darted out from the crowd, and came towards us.

"Bud!" Violet cried. "Something in her voice made my heart ache. It had in it all the joy that only reunion can bring, that only youth can feel. It had a little catch in it as though the girl had waited almost too long for this moment.

Yet such is the self-conscious instinct that comes up in us in a crowd, Violet simply held out her hand to the boy. But for a moment they stood and looked into each other's eyes, and no words were necessary. The porters' put down the packages.

"Thank you," I said "you're very kind."

"And still they stayed. In my ignorance I wondered why. Then Bud came to the earth from the heaven of Violet's blue eyes, and boy-like he laughed. He put his hand in his pocket and handed some money to each of the men—and with pleased expressions, they melted into the crowd.

"Oh that was it," I said. It was my first city experience.

"Well, Aunt Enid I'm glad to see you." He turned to me for the first time, his hand out. Then he picked up as many of our bundles as he could and led the way through the station.

But neither Violet or I could go very fast. Everything was so new and strange and huge to us. I have since come into New York from every possible angle. I have seen the irregular skyline from the New Jersey river front; I have watched the huge, unbelievable mass of buildings in the lower island from the harbor; but nothing has surpassed my first impression as we walked behind Bud through that enormous station, with gold stars painted on its blue ceiling, and windows whose that corridors are laid between the outer and inner pines and men walk along them at various floors looking like queer little black spiders.

But Bud would not let us stay too long, and finally we found ourselves in a tiny restaurant across the street from the station.

"This is my lunch hour," he explained. "This is my lunch hour, and I got half an hour's leave to meet you. You'll want something to eat too."

"We have lunch," I began.

"Not here," he said a look of alarm on his face as he saw my hand go to a bundle. And he ordered for all of us.

He scarcely took his eyes from Violet and I don't think she looked at anything but him. Manlike, he ate heartily, but Violet was far too happy and excited to be able to taste food. I kept silent and watched.

I had never seen him so well dressed, and good clothes became him. But was rather a handsome chap with gray eyes that were fairly large for a man, an excellent profile that carried strength in every line—except for a little softness in the curve of the chin—and hair as straight and as brown as could be. He was unusually tall and he had that leanness that I have sometimes heard described as "Western" because so many Western men have this long lean body.

"What are you doing?" I asked him.

"I'm in a broker's office now," he said. It's a new place and I like it and think I'm going to stay. I'll tell you the funny way I happened to get it later—for I was fired from my last place. That's why I don't want to overstay my lunch-time.

We got up and gathered again our packages. Bud promised to see about our trunk—and telling us how to reach the address we had, he dashed away from us, promising to come after dinner.

So Violet and I were left alone at least in the eyes.

FLAPPERS TO FIGHT FOR SHORT SKIRTS

TORONTO, Sept. 3.—The fight for the short skirt is still on, and is becoming more general. In Montreal, the younger feminine element has organized to make a last stand against the threatened invasion of the long clinging garments which the Parisian designer is determinedly forcing on the feminine public.

"I do not think that the long skirt will have any lasting popularity," said one of the foreign buyers in a large departmental store here. "Today I received a cable from the other side stating that, laws laid down by the foreign designer is an interesting phase of the feminist movement according to local observers. Women have achieved political and economic freedom. It looks as though they were about to achieve sartorial freedom as well.

The revolt of women against the Molyneux, in his fall fashion display, is showing skirts that are much shorter. They aren't as short as the flapper skirt, but they show a distinct tendency to revert to the former abbreviated style."
