The Old Order Changes

By DAVID LYALL

"Mother's asleep, Betty. I want you and Dumps to go quietly to the baker's and bring in some buns for tea. If they have any sugar ones, bring skippennyworth."

The children's eyes sparkled as they took the money from her hand, and Dumps, a small cherubic boy, turned a prompt somersault.

Small wonder that they loved their teacher. Their round, confiding eyes lifted so trustfully to her face often made her feel that she wanted to cry.

A big thing had been offered to Mary Freeland that day, the biggest thing in life, and though she could not accept it, it had made her grateful.

She knew what a thrill the knowledge would give Hope Disney, but she would never know! She relieved the children of their satchels, sent them off happily, and slipped back to the kitchen to arrange the tea table.

Having swept the hearth and opened the casement window and dusted all down, she decided to lay it there. She was quite well aware that the Disney's ate the most of their meals in the kitchen to save work carrying heavy trays to and fro.

"After all, just think, Arthur. If there had been no children, what should we have done?" she asked him one day. But Arthur, with the vision of mature school-days to come and absolutely no resources to meet them had hardly caught the radiance of her suggestion.

Mary carried the baby out to the sunshine, and she made a pretty picture just under the shade of the weeping ash on the little lawn. So quickly the child knows its lover, the newest Disney baby snuggled down on Mary's shoulder, cooing to her contentedly.

"Here, give me the baby while you go and have a wash and brush up." "I'll have to get tea. The children should be home immediately. I must have slept quite a while."

"So glad you have," said Mary affectionately. "The children have gone to Sowerby's for some buns and tea is ready."

"Oh, Mary, you are an angel, but you shouldn't you know," said Hope Disney as she pushed an escaped wisp of her hair behind her small sensitive ear. "And whatever you shall do without you in Mardocks, I can't think. Arthur was only talking about it this morning. He called it a calamity."

"I'm not gone, yet, at least not for good, and I don't a thousand miles to Gormley Lane. I can eye it any evening day. Give me a chance, Hope. Don't kill and bury me like that!"

Hope Disney's mouth was a little tremulous as she crept through to the scullery to wash her face and hands. There was a small bath-room she had preserved from her early upbringing, and she called the communal towel a crime.

So there was a towel horse in the upstairs with only cold water in it and there was no one to carry hot water to the bedrooms. So it was that!

"What Prince?" asked Mrs. Disney. "The new Squire, of course. He hasn't been down the village yet. I suppose?"

Hope Disney shook her head. "If he has, I haven't seen him. But then I was washing out some of the children's things while baby had his morning sleep. So you saw him! How thrilling! Tell me all about him!"

"He is very like one of the portraits in the long gallery at the Hall. Sir Fulke Manning—I believe it is, but so inevitable that the little household should take the line of least resistance. But Mrs. Disney was rather particular about towels and did not permit the use of an indiscriminate one. It was one of the few niceties scullery with all the towels neatly folded in a row.

A good sousing in the soft Folder water refreshed her body, and her spirit was cheered by Mary Freeland's presence in the adjoining room.

Like strong wine had her friendship been to that brave, overwrought, plucky wife and mother, on whom life and destiny had been so hard. Yet she had had a great deal of happiness; she often said so to Disney when she found him rebelling against the drudgery of her lot.

She was still able to find pleasure in simple things, in the first primrose by the river's brim, the soft mystery of the dawn, the radiance of sunset, and the light on children's faces.

"After all, just think, Arthur. If there had been no children, what should we have done?" she asked him one day. But Arthur, with the vision of mature school-days to come and absolutely no resources to meet them had hardly caught the radiance of her suggestion.

Mary carried the baby out to the sunshine, and she made a pretty picture just under the shade of the weeping ash on the little lawn. So quickly the child knows its lover, the newest Disney baby snuggled down on Mary's shoulder, cooing to her contentedly.

It was a pretty baby, for Disneys were comely people, and if they had had a dog's chance would have been beautiful specimens of humanity. Presently the bun bearers came back from Sowerby's and the table was triumphantly spread.

Mrs. Disney infused the tea, grateful for the comfort of the little fire and the spread table, and they all sat down. While the meal progressed there was not much chance for individual talk for the little ones' wants had to be attended to.

But at length they were all fed, and while Betty and Dumps, already learning to be useful, solemnly carried the teacups into the scullery to wash up, and the younger two returned to their play in the back garden, Mary and Mrs. Disney sat down under the ash tree.

"I was coming to see you yesterday with the great news that I'd met and talked with the Prince."

"What Prince?" asked Mrs. Disney. "The new Squire, of course. He hasn't been down the village yet. I suppose?"

Hope Disney shook her head. "If he has, I haven't seen him. But then I was washing out some of the children's things while baby had his morning sleep. So you saw him! How thrilling! Tell me all about him!"

"He is very like one of the portraits in the long gallery at the Hall. Sir Fulke Manning—I believe it is, but so simple and unaffected. I have a queer sort of feeling, Hope, that his coming is going to be very good for Mardocks, that it will change every thing in fact."

Mrs. Disney looked faintly incredulous. "I can't imagine it happening. Mardocks will go on world without end. But tell me, did you find out anything? Did he come quite alone? Was he married?"

"That I don't know; but yes I do—sure he isn't. He is a sort of elder of fortune, that was the impression I got, and he will look Mardocks with straight clear eyes, unobscured by the mists of the past. He isn't encased as yet in the Manning armour."

FIRE SALE!

We are selling in the basement of our warehouse Tuesday and Wednesday, Dec. 9th and 10th, to the retail trade of P. E. I. at a specially reduced price two cars of fruit, one consisting of seven hundred and fifty boxes of McIntosh and Winesap Apples, the other car consisting of Lemons, Grapefruit, Tomatoes, Celery, Cucumbers, Sweet Potatoes, Bananas, etc. This mixed car from Boston was shipped under Heater's Service, and slightly damaged from fire which occurred on Dec. 3rd at Fairville, N. B., en route to Charlottetown. The car of Apples shipped from Pendleton, B. C., was slightly damaged in transit on account of a defective car. We are selling both these cars for the account of the shippers.

In order to allow our out of town customers to benefit by this special sale, the contents of the cars will not be on sale until Tuesday morning. To our retail trade in Charlottetown we ask you to visit the warehouse, to our out of town customers full descriptions and specially reduced prices will be given you on the telephone if interested. Retail storekeepers only, positively no exceptions.

The above mentioned goods will not in any way hinder the delivery to our different customers for their Christmas orders booked in advance, as we have already duplicated these cars, and they will arrive early next week.
