ZORA

The invisible

By
J. R. WILMOT

"Yes, I know," said Sonia, "but Osbert's so terribly independent, and it has been rather awful for him—under suspicion and to feel that he couldn't really clear himself. But everything's going to be all right now. I've just left him. He looks years younger, and—we're going to be married next June."

"I hope you will be very happy," said Blayne, conscious of his awkwardness. "You deserve to be you know."

"I'm sure we shall," Sonia said, her eyes studying the oriental pattern in the carpet.

"By the way," Blayne went on, suddenly. "Since last we met certain things have come to light which prove that your father had some money put away where the lawyers did not know. I'm seeing them about it, and in a week or two several thousand pounds will be transferred to your mother's account."

"That's splendid!" the girl exclaimed. "I must go and break the glad tidings to her. Good-bye, Doctor Blayne, and thank you—ever so much."

Sonia held out her hand to Blayne and as he grasped it their eyes met, but he did not let her see the disappointment that was in his own.

When she had gone he stood staring at the closed door.

This was the end. First Hooker, now Sonia Gaynor. What had life left to offer him?

With a sigh he turned away. Then his eyes brightened.

He was forgetting. He had promised Ann Morrison to go down to "Red Gables" this afternoon to arrange about the transference of the money which Hooker had extorted from Gaynor—money which Ann Morrison realised could no longer be retained.

An hour later he was talking to her in the large drawing-room.

"I haven't made any plans for the future yet, Mr. Blayne," she said. "I thought I'd better wait until I had you to advise me."

"I've told Sonia that her mother may expect some money from a source which has recently been discovered," he answered her, avoiding her eyes. "That will be seen to as soon as letters of administration have been taken out by yourself on your brother's estate. You realise, of course, that this is the only possible course?"

The woman nodded.

"It was not what Chris would have wished," she said, sadly. "But it is what is right. We shall be leaving here as soon as other arrangements can be made."

"Did your brother leave very much money of his own?" asked Blayne.

"Just a little," Ann answered. "He was very careful. But I think we shall be all right. I'm a strong, capable woman, Dr. Blayne."

But Blayne's thoughts were rather far away just then, for he heard the sound of a girl's voice talking to Strephan, the big Alredale.

"Have you told Natalie?"

There was a note of apprehension, almost eagerness, in Blayne's voice.

"She knows that her Uncle C. is dead, if that is what you mean? As for the others he wouldn't have wanted her to know."

Blayne nodded in agreement. Came a knock at the door.

"May I come in?" called a voice. Mrs. Morrison went across to the door and flung it open.

"Oh, it's Doctor Blayne," cried the girl. "I'm so glad you came. There are lots of things I want to ask you—alone," she added, looking significantly at her aunt.

Mrs. Morrison left them alone, and Blayne felt apprehensive as the door closed.

Natalie Morrison turned to him quite seriously, with a question on her red lips.

"Dr. Blayne, I want you to tell me whether Zora had anything to do with Uncle C's death?"

"Why do you ask that?" asked Blayne, astonished at the girl's question. "Also, I might add, who is Zora?"

"I ask because I've a suspicion that Uncle C. didn't die naturally—heart failure, Auntie Ann told me. Tell me, Dr. Blayne. Was Uncle C. Zora?"

Blayne looked into her eyes, and he knew that she would know whether or not he was speaking the truth.

"Yes," he answered, slowly. "He was Zora, the invisible."

He had expected Natalie to look grieved and shocked. But instead, she seemed curiously relieved.

"I've often wondered," she sighed, "and now, of course, I know. I had an idea that night when the meeting was held, and he didn't come to see me, as he usually did. I knew that something was the matter then."

"I want you to try and forget all about it," said Blayne, with one hand on her shoulder, as he stood beside her chair. "Youth, you know, should always look straight ahead, and never behind."

"Yes, I suppose you're right. But do you know, Dr. Blayne, I keep thinking that we've met before some time?"

"That must have been the night I called around with Inspector Webster," said Blayne, easily.

"Not then," she mused. "I think it must have been after that—not so very long ago."

"I think you must have been mistaken."

"Perhaps I am, but tell me: Did Uncle C. give you any message for me? I wish you had let me know before he died. I'm sure he would have liked to have seen me."

"There was a message—or rather perhaps it couldn't be called a message," Blayne told her, conscious of his own awkwardness and obvious confusion. "He said that he hated having to leave you without an Uncle C., and asked me if I'd like Blayne broke his sentence awkwardly and deliberately avoided Natalie's eyes. Yet for all that he was aware of an uncomfortable feeling. He remembered how she had looked a few nights ago by the open window. She was a child, and yet . . . now she was a child no longer.

"No one could replace Uncle C.," she said, slowly. "He always reminded me of the Fairy Godfather who was very nice and kind, but who wasn't real, and you knew he wasn't real. I suppose it is because I am growing up. When you are grown up, Uncles are not nearly so attractive as they are in childhood." She paused.

Peter Blayne looked at this vision of girlish loveliness startled. He felt that she had weighed him in the balance with Uncle C. and had found him wanting. No doubt, he felt, he had his shortcomings as an uncle, but . . . He did something he had never done in his life before.

He suddenly put his arms around Natalie and kissing her full on the lips, and she . . . she did not think it at all strange, for after all uncles did occasionally kiss their nieces.

PAINLEVE IS FOUND TO BE CRITICALLY ILL

PARIS, Nov. 25.—(U.P.)—Paul Painleve, Air Minister, was found by his doctors today to be critically ill with a weak heart. After a consultation, they ordered complete rest. Another consultation will be held tonight, after which he may be ordered to abandon his Cabinet post temporarily. The Cabinet considered the possibility of a temporary substitute. Painleve is 69.

"It is strange! My feet keep going to sleep."

"They must get bored being always with you."—Gazzettino Illustrato, Venice.

Some persons, given credit for having better sense, just keep on getting married and getting divorced.

"Have you a speaking acquaintance with the woman next door?"

"A speaking acquaintance? I know her so well we don't speak at all."

Persian Balm creates and preserves lovely and youthful complexions. Tones and stimulates the skin. Fragrant as a flower. Cool as morning dew. Swiftly absorbed by the tissues, making the skin wonderfully soft-textured. Unrivalled as an acid to feminine elegance. Delightful to use. Imparts additional charm to the daintiest of women. Persian Balm is the one toilet requisite for the exacting woman. Peerless as a beautifier.

Basketball, stiffness—Minnard's, relief.

CANADIAN BREVITIES

VANCOUVER, Nov. 26.—The export trade in lumber from British Columbia, one of the richest sources in the world of high-grade commercial lumber, has been notably good this year and prospects are most promising. In the first eight months shipments to the British Isles had totalled 69,000,000 feet and by the end of the year the total will pass 100,000,000 feet.
