Janice Meredith
By PAUL LEICESTER-FORD

IV.

Mr. McClave lessened his chance with Mr. Meredith when, on the next Sunday, he read an announcement in church that the State assembly had been called to pass on the measures of the recent Congress and followed it with a sermon holding it the duty of the community to join hands in resisting the country's enemies.

The minister also announced that the Committee of Observation had called a meeting to instruct the county's representatives in the Assembly on how to vote on the measures.

Squire Meredith announced that he would never go into Mr. McClave's church again and, although a member of the Assembly, refused to attend the committee meeting.

News of the committee's action was brought by Squire Hennon, who blamed Meredith's non-participation for its endorsement of Congress' policy of resistance to the British authority. Hennon, also a member of the Assembly, had feared to oppose the "hotheads" of the committee.

The committee had voted to buy twenty barrels of powder and Hennon had revealed that Charles Fowles, the Merediths' bond servant had been drilling the invincibles. The squire immediately sent word to have the bondman appear. Then Hennon, while his son and Janice sat in the room, proposed that the two marry, saying that Phillemont was too shy to propose directly himself.

"Oh, daddy, I don't want to marry," Janice appealed. "I want to stay home with you!"

But her parents silenced her and Mrs. Meredith, realizing that her husband was anger at Mr. McClave, barred the clergyman, as a son-in-law agreed when the squire announced that the girl should marry young Hennon.

Phillemont, at his father's urging, was about to seal the bargain with a kiss when Charles suddenly appeared in the doorway. To the girl it seemed that an ally had risen in her need.

"I sent for you because I hear you've been drilling the rebels," Meredith said to Charles. "Is it true?"

"Ask Phil Hennon," answered Charles.

"Do you mean Hennon has been drilling with the other villains?" roared Meredith.

Hennon's admission sent the squire into a rage. He cancelled the engagement and ordered the youth and his father from the house.

When they had gone, he berated Charles.

"Is the like of you—debtors, runaways and such trash—that is making all this trouble," he declared.

But Charles defended the American cause.

"What the Whigs demand is only what the English themselves fought for under Fynn and Hampden," he said. "And if the words 'Great Britain' instead of the 'American Colonies' were written into the acts of parliament of which the Whigs complain, there'd be rebellion from Land's End to Duncansby Head."

The squire, unconvinced, commanded his servant to cease such talk and when Charles offered to buy his freedom saying he thought he could get the money, Meredith flatly refused, and ordered him back to the stable.

V.

Charles, sent on an errand to the village, returned a few days later with the information that the Massachusetts Committee of Safety had dispatched news of the Battle of Lexington to the other colonies, warning them that British Regulars had fired on a militia company without provocation.

The squire halted the news as indicating that the incipient rebellion would be crushed.

That night, Charles met Janice on the lawn and asked her intercede with her father to let him buy his freedom.

"Why do you want your freedom?" she asked.

"I want to get away—to go to a place where there's a chance for a quicker death than eating one's heart by inches."

"How beautifully he talks!" thought Janice.

"It will be better to let me go before I turn mad," the bondman went on. "You need not have availed me as you've done lately to show me that I'm beneath you. I knew it without that. But who is this 'put' you are going to marry?"

"Janice said with spirit, "It's quite in keeping that a bond servant should think little of blood."

Charles cut the air with his whip. "That for all the blood in the world unless there is honor with it," he exclaimed hotly.

"So, grapes!" the girl.

"It's no case of sour grapes, as you'd know if I told you my story," "Oh, I should monstrous like to hear it!"

Charles came nearer to her.

"I swore I should die with me, but there's one woman to whom I'm next attached."

He stopped as a figure approached on the lawn.

"Is the squire home, Miss?" asked Joe Bagby. "I just wanted to see if we could fix things between us about the next election."

As he spoke there was a sudden rush of men, who seemed to appear from nowhere. They overwhelmed Charles and, at Bagby's order, some stood by Janice to prevent her screaming. Others dragged Mr. Meredith from the house, while another group started a fire and over it hung a kettle of tar.

The threat was too much for the squire. At Bagby's demand he swore to give up tea, to withdraw as candidate for the Assembly and finally, in a timeless haze, sang some of the songs of Liberty.

VI.

Brunswick and the neighborhood not long after were excited as General Washington and Colonel Lee passed through on their way to Boston, where Washington was to take over command of the army.

The Invincibles turned out and, under Charles's direction, drilled in the leader's honor while Bagby revealed that they had acquired twenty barrels of powder.

Phillemont meanwhile was a constant visitor at Greenwood and made a point of spying on Janice. One evening after supper she rose from the table and went out of the house, Phillemont following at a discreet distance. Janice, aware of this, suddenly turned and accused him of being a spy.

"I am going to the stable to see Charles," she said. "If you follow me, I'll—"

The girl turned away, leaving Phil a picture of indecision and anxiety. She knew that Charles had gone to the village, but went into the stable and sat down in the hay.

Soon she heard two men approaching and knew, from his voice, that one was Charles.

"Tell the lads I'll lead them and meet them tomorrow evening at Drigg's barn," she heard him say. Fowles went on to tell his companion that, failing to buy his freedom, he was going to run away, despite the fact that his capture meant doubling his time of service. The other then left and Janice stepped from the stable.

Charles was startled at her appearance, and asked her if she had overheard him, but she promised she would not reveal what she had heard.

He then told her that General Washington had written to the revolutionary committee in Brunswick to ask that the Invincibles send him their powder, of which the American Army was desperately in need, but that Bagby had refused on the ground that it might be needed for the defense of Brunswick and

Presentation

On Wednesday evening, April 10th, upwards of fifty members of Hamilton L. O. L. and Lady Clyde, L. O. B. A. Lodges, Clyde River with a few immediate friends, gathered at the home of Mr. John A. Murray, Clyde River, who has acted as Janitor for both lodges for some time, also for the lower hall when anything in connection with the lodges was held there.

Mr. John A. MacKinnon, chairman for the gathering, called on Collin D. MacPhail, who read an address to Brother Murray, while Mrs. Heber MacLean presented him with a purse of money. Brother Murray, in a few words thanked those present for their kind words and gift. Short complimentary speeches were given by Mr. James MacPhail and Daniel MacDonald. After the singing of "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow" and bousing of Brother Murray, those present had a jolly good time.

Excellent bag-pipe music was supplied by Mr. John N. MacKinnon, Kilmuir. A delicious lunch was served by the ladies. The following is the address.

April 10, 1935.

Mr. John A. Murray, Clyde River. Dear Johnnie:—The advent of Spring and the wakening up of all Nature about us brings to our minds the fact that we too might "wake up" and realize the worth of such a citizen as you have proven yourself to be.

So, we, your friends, have gathered here to express to you our sincere appreciation of your "helping hand" among us, especially as janitor of the hall. Whenever any public function has taken place in the hall, you have always been a veritable "Johannie on the spot," in preparing the hall for the forthcoming event. Then too on the stage, we would sorely miss your talent and ability in our local entertainments, had we to part with you.

We would ask you then, to accept this small gift as a more tangible token of our esteem for you. It's intrinsic value is small, but along with it go a host of good wishes for a long and happy life.

Here's a hand to a worthy brother. One who greets you with a smile, Who always helps the other, Though it oft seems not worth the while.

It's easy to work for money, As you journey mile by mile, We give our cheer for the man who works.

For nothing, all the while. Signed on behalf of the L. O. L., L. O. B. A., and your friends of the community.
