The Queen's Holiday

BY Elizabeth Corbett

"We begin by saying that Queen Elsa is dead. She was pretender of the throne of Leucadia and the only surviving member of her house," said Elsa.

"I suspect he was doing just that. With Prince Paul and Queen Elsa both out of the way, what motive is there for Leucadia to go back to monarchy? Of course the other European powers could appoint a new royal family. But in the twentieth century it seems rather out of style."

"Yes, I am sure we can." "I'll restore peace in the country," asked Elsa.

"You can do more than that. You can insure it," said Elsa cheerfully. "Just how, if I may ask?" "You can marry me to my American friend, Mr. Layton."

"I could, but—" "Think you that will save us some time, and perhaps some rope. We are very anxious to start back for America at once."

"I am quite sure. Do it, and at once, please." "I can't do it, and she has no right to ask you to," said Ted indignantly.

"The Ambassador looked from one to the other of them; Ted indignant and saucy, Elsa confident and grinning. "If you wish to proceed this morning, Your Highness, you and Mr. Layton can freshen up for the ceremony. Myself wish to put on my dress uniform to do honor to the ceremony."

"The Ambassador came around this desk and asked quietly, "You will not think I am delaying unnecessarily if I also take time to send a message? An important message?"

Elsa drew a long breath, and reaffirmed her decision. "By all means send that message." "With Ted growing low thunder in her ear, they were shown up the great marble staircase to the second floor.

When she had viewed the bathroom in the suite to which they were shown, Elsa decided against a bath. "Their staircases are magnificent here," she called through the door into the room where Ted was pacing the floor and fuming. "But the bathrooms are done better in America."

Ted, unbuttoning his collar, growled back at her. A minute later he appeared in the doorway. He was soaping his face for shave, but over the latter he said indignantly, "I'll have this shave, thank you, because I badly need it. But you needn't think I'm going to let you go ahead with this preposterous scheme of yours."

She linked her arm in his and drew him to the window. There she opened the sash a crack, and the muffled shouting in the street grew louder. She closed the window and smiled at him. "It did not take the Ambassador long to get the good word around. The papers will not be out for another hour. But already the newboys are shouting, 'Queen Elsa assassinated!'"

"The crowd is shouting, too, isn't it?" "The crowd is crowing for joy. Oh, not because I am dead, darling! But this will put an end to the war in Leucadia. In his ear she whispered, "That which they are shouting in the street, darling - if it is not very far from you, that might be true this very minute."

"That thought Ted seized her and held her close for an instant. In that instant he was lost. "Oh, go ahead and have it your own way!" he growled. "You may well do it with my permission. You're going to do it anyhow."

"Then finish your shaving," ordered Elsa. "It's not considerate of you, Ted, to keep me waiting on such an occasion."

The next thing Ted knew, she had her arm through his and at her side he was drawn to the top of the beautiful staircase. A crowd of attaches and footmen had gathered in the hall below, and a butler was placing two tall vases of flowers where Elsa and Ted would have to walk past them. As they started down the stairs Elsa whispered with a smile, "Of course for years to come there will be rumors that Queen Elsa isn't dead at all. He will be seen here and seen there, like the poor Romanoffs."

"She will be seen on the Orient Express this very night," muttered Ted. "When we get to Paris I shall begin to breathe a little freer. And there we can cable my father for money."

They were down the staircase now. At their right the doors of the Ambassador's office were thrown open for them. Ted paused to offer Elsa ceremoniously an inch in a wrinkled sleeve four inches too short for it. "I'm so happy I'm dizzy," he whispered.

"That isn't happiness, maybe. It's something that would need a new word to describe it. But I can't help feeling guilty when I remember that by the time we come out of this room," he paused obligingly on the threshold "Queen Elsa of Leucadia will have become plain Mrs. Layton."

Elsa stepped over the threshold and turned to smile at him. She said the last word for the time, and for history as well, when she murmured, "Miss Higby will have the fun of buying satin evening gowns to buy white satin evening gowns to match your gown, or to contrast."

Fitting footnotes are delighted for gold or silver kid sandals have satin to be dyed to match your gown. Exotic brocades are made into sandals or pumps, dainty satin pumps are trimmed with high-standing bows, or sandals with intricate strappings.

"This is the perfect time to start her on a junior size beauty room which will become a part of her daily life and will stand her in good stead for the rest of her life. Teach her to care for herself and to take pride in her appearance. It won't spoil her fun and it will teach her the proper beauty habits which will take care of her future loveliness."

Let her play "grooming" by having her own little dressing table. Place on it her own comb and brush, a cotton container (they make very cute ones now), two one for a good quality witch hazel bath oil. To get the little gals to follow a routine for the beauty, make bathing and cleansing the main game of imitating the grownups.

She'll really scrub-in-the-tub if the reward is the use of a bath oil or bubble bath. Teach her how to keep her skin clean and fresh. She will be really thankful to you when
