CHAPTER VII

An Early Morning Party
Filling in for one of his men, Selwood sat dealing at the large faro table near his desk. It was two hours since he had left Christie. In that interval she had had another visitor at the tent. Her father had already awakened, when Christie was called to the tent door by a voice and, looking cautiously out, saw Starbuck standing in the moonlight.

"I didn't want you to think I went away with any hard feelings," he said, explaining himself earnestly to Christie and throwing into his words that touch of sympathy and interest he was always able to summon. Christie listened with reluctance. But as her caller was at no loss for words, he was soon heard by her father, who, raising his voice, called him, over Christie's protest, into the tent.

"Here's the man," he said, "that can give us the help we need, Christie. If you'll treat him in the way you'd ought to.

Christie burst into tears. The obligation of secrecy was on her—she thought she knew why, now; but she would not resist the satisfaction of a covert threat. "If Mr. Starbuck won't help us," she exclaimed, "we may find somebody in Sleepy Cat, that will."

She was sorry the instant she had spoken, but it was too late to recall her words.

"Anybody that goes near the store without me," Starbuck said calmly, "will get riddled with buckshot—so," he added, looking first at Christie and then at her father, "don't make any mistake like that."

He marched with dignity out of the tent. Fryer kept up a weak fire of reproach. Christie was used to such things on more subjects than one, and only continued to listen silently. What thoughts were in her mind, her father, least of all, could have surmised. She gave him some refreshment presently, and he fell into an uneasy sleep. That moment seemed to rouse her from her apathy and signalize her resolve.

She rose cautiously but hurriedly, caught up a shawl that lay across her cot, opened her little trunk, and stealthily drew out a scarf.

Pausing and looking at her father only long enough to be sure he slept, she carefully lowered the wick of the lantern, blew out the light, and stepped with as little noise as possible to the tent door. Wrapping herself in her shawl, and winding her scarf about her head and neck, she pushed open the fly and stood alone out in the moonlight.

Once started, Christie did not hesitate. She walked swiftly along the street, hardly knowing which way to look in her quest, but determined to follow it. The only place where she hoped she might make a successful inquiry was at the big barn; and toward this she directed her steps.

She was being trailed, though she did not realize it. Believing herself unobserved and unseen, she pursued her course, and it was only when Rob Scott stepped out of a shadow in front of her that she was frightened.

"Where you looking for somebody, lady?" he asked.

Christie jumped, but Scott's inoffensive manner reassured her. She had seen him in company with Selwood at the store, and some instinct told her he meant no harm.

"I am looking for some one."

"Who is it?"

"He's the superintendent of the freighting line."

"I guess I know who you mean. He was down to see your father to-night."

"Oh, she cried in confusion. "I don't mean Mr. Starbuck."

Scott was confident. "I don't, either. You mean John Selwood. If you do want to see him, I think I can find him. But I'll have to be gone a few minutes. Now, here's the barn"—he pointed to the big structure close at hand. "If you'd walk down with me and wait a few minutes in the office, I'll have him here."

Still in fear and trembling, Christie accompanied her guide to the barn office. Two formidable-looking dogs rushed to the door as Scott opened it. Admonishing them, he turned with a quiet grin. A lighted lantern on the desk revealed the interior to Christie. "If you can sit here for five minutes," said Scott, "these dogs will guard you better than anybody in Sleepy Cat could do it. Just get them a little." Christie made friends cautiously with the two dogs. "We call one Chole," explained Scott, "and this is Sweetheart. They're Mr. Selwood's favorite wagon dogs—half bull and half mastiff—and if anybody tries to come into this office while I'm gone, they'll eat 'em up. Are you willing to wait with them?"

Christie smiled rather mournfully. "I suppose I can't help it," she said uneasily. "Please hurry!"

Scott lost no time in getting to Selwood, whom he found at his desk. The Indian whispered to him. Selwood seized his hat, followed Scott out the back door and the two, singly, and walking in different directions joined Christie.

Chole and Sweetheart, barking furiously, sprang up to be fondled when Selwood opened the door. Scott took the dogs outside, and Selwood turned to Christie. "I've been looking everywhere for you—and if I hadn't seen Mr. Scott, I never should have found you. Are you in business here, Mr. Selwood?"

"Why—yes."

"What is it, may I ask?"

He answered haltingly—glad it was dark. "Well, I'm mixed up in different kinds of business here—that's what got me into trouble with your father." He spoke with a laugh—or tried to. "I run this Russell and Wentworth freighting outfit," he continued. "I suppose if I called myself anything, it might be a mining man. What has happened?"

She was so confused and overcome now that she could hardly summon the words she wanted. "Nothing has happened. I feared what might happen—tonight. You didn't tell me," she ventured, "just what you were going to do about the store." Then she added, disconnectedly, "Mr. Starbuck came over again."

Selwood looked keenly at her. "What did he want?"

"First he said," she began brokenly, "he wanted to turn the store back to father."

"Was that all?"

"No."

"What else?"

"I—"

"I—what?"

"The same condition be named before."

home of their genial mail courier, Mr. Seymour Scott, Cornwall, for the purpose of showing their appreciation of the excellent service that he has given during the past fourteen years. Good car roads, fine weather, good humored visitors, and a hearty welcome by Mr. and Mrs. Scott all contributed to the success of the evening's entertainment. After the men had discussed present prices and future prospects of potatoes and the ladies had talked about their house-cleaning and spring styles, Mr. Harry Hyde called the gathering to order and the following programme was pleasantly carried out:

Solo—J. E. Hearts.
Speech—Colin McPhail.

have gathered at your home tonight. We realize that your task is not an easy one, especially in the winter time, when the roads are not as well broken as they might be. But despite the bad roads, wet days and stormy days, we always found you on the job and found our mail in the box at the proper time. Indeed many of us sometimes unable to begin our dinner till Seymour brings the meat, bread and groceries from the corner. During the fourteen years that you have been on our route, there has not been a single complaint, and we hope that you may see fit to continue for many years to come.

In conclusion, we ask you to accept this small purse as a slight token of our appreciation and friendship.

Does your menu Signal Green or Red?

FAR ahead in the darkness, green signals indicate to the locomotive engineer that the track is clear. He proceeds with confidence. Full steam ahead.

How far ahead can you see into the darkness of your future? Is an "open track" clearly marked? Can you see the green lights that say: "full steam ahead to success and happiness?"

The green and red signals are your daily diet. What you eat can indicate what you'll be. Right food can open a clear track to success and happiness—and bring you joy along the way.

Grape-Nuts is abundantly a "right food". It gives your body a wealth of the precious varied nourishment it needs. It helps you to beautiful teeth and good digestion by tempting you to chew its crisp, golden kernels. But best of all... it possesses a down-right goodness of flavor that brings a really new thrill to breakfast.

Buy a package of Grape-Nuts at your grocer's. Serve it tomorrow. It costs less because there are nineteen servings in each package. And Grape-Nuts is made in Canada from Canadian wheat.

ADVANCED REFRIGERATION

The TOP of every Frigidaire is a porcelain-topped table!

Women with only two hands find the broad, unobscured top of the Frigidaire a very real blessing a dozen times every day... Food on its way into a Frigidaire and food on its way out need not be juggled, or tipped, or inconveniently parked on the distant kitchen table... the flat expanse of snowy porcelain atop the Frigidaire makes such a perfect serving shelf... It is an ideal place to put piping-hot things that should be cooled off before they are exposed to low temperatures... a splendid permanent place to keep the few foods that need not be refrigerated... And nothing—hot or cold, smooth or scratchy—can in any way mar the life long lustre of its diamond-hard Porcelain-on-steel finish.
