Happy Landing

BY BASIL HAYE

ANNA IN SAFE HANDS

"Don't talk to me about Lethbridge! He gives me a pain in the neck——"

"Does that worry him?" Bond cut in. "He's on clover. Seems to be having a good time. I don't know how much of it he spares for his job at the office, or wherever it is, but—this hotel seems to be his landing ground."

Foreham was silent for a moment, then swung back to matters of more personal interest. "What about my mother's invitation to come down to us at Sunning over the week-end? Or, are you going to Sunninghoime with the Rumanian girl? I did hear something about that—"

"I'm staying in town, Tony; but thank your mother all the same. It was nice of her to ask me. I just don't feel like breaking the ice down there. Sunning would be a regular whispering gallery once I showed my face. No! And it mightn't be good for you, either, especially if they've an idea of giving you a staff job."

"Sooner by far stay as I am!" the lashed with impatience. "The more, because—any day now—the way things are looking, we may all go up in grim earnest, and really earn our keep, I suppose——"

He glanced at the others, who were too deeply concerned with what Lethbridge was saying to them to be interested elsewhere.

"I suppose from the little you would say last time you and I talked Michael, you really know a darned sight more of what's going on than we humble folk do," he said. "That's what's worrying me. I can't help wanting to know what the game is with you. This Rumanian affair last night, for instance, after you mentioning his name——"

"Tony, what did I say? Forget it. You look after yourself, get that staff appointment and sit pretty. My game isn't your meat. That's why I'm not coming down to your mother and you at Sunning. I don't want you mixed up too closely with me——"

"And why not? There's nothing against you, officially. Even Lethbridge has to admit as much——"

"There is something against me, Tony. A regular gascloud of suspicion. While a particle of that lingers, I'm tabu. You know that."

"Have it your own way. But, Michael, if the game you're playing le s you down, if you're ever up against it, Im Tony Fareham, and—I'm in with you on anything."

Fareham clearly wanted to say more, drive his purpose further home, but Anna Gregorescu, catching sight of Bond for the first time, caused a diversion by springing up and moving impulsively towards her Michael.

"It is going to be all right, Michael, dear, if I go down to this place of yours now with Delma? We are at once such good friends, and—I may forget so much of my trouble if I have so much nice and kind company. Also—you will be there with us, no?"

Bond drew Anna away from the others, and reminded her that he must be on the spot while police investigations into her father's death still lasted.

He explained that he would need to look into her father's private affairs, to find out how she was situated about money and so on, and put everything legally in order through his own solicitor, Keeping. He then took her over to the management offices, where she signed a document authorizing him to examine her father's papers, and in effect act on her behalf, till full legal authority had been obtained.

With this in his possession and when Anna had left to rejoin the others Bond made his way by the staircase to the first floor, retracing his steps of overnight along the curving corridor so it seemed—for miles. But when he reached the cream-enamelled door on which were the bronze figures 17, he had no need to use the key he had obtained from the office.

The door was open, and from the small entrance-foyer he passed into the room off the right, as he had done the previous evening. He was not altogether surprised, though a little disappointed, to find Inspector House in occupation.

CHAPTER X

HE SENT MISS VIVIAN A NOTE!

"The management 'phoned that you were on your way up, and why, Mr. Bond, the Inspector greeted him with a smile. I've already been going through the contents of this writing-table, and examining anything documentary, likely to prove useful in the way of information."

"Found anything, Inspector?" Bond asked guessing that the answer would reveal House's disappointment.

"You're quite at liberty to do what you like with this lot, Mr. Bond. It's all personal, and of no use to me."

"Having got your self-confessed murderer, House," Bond said, "I can't see why any further documentary evidence needs to be found."

"The trouble is, Mr. Bond, that the self-confessed murderer made one mistake. He forgot to leave his finger-prints on the scene of the crime. Or, shall I put it this way? The person who did leave his finger-prints around this room left those which definitely do not belong to the man who has given himself up. I'm looking for the gentleman who did leave his finger-prints I should have told you all this before if you'd been ready to meet me half-way as to the background of all this. Since you're not disposed that way——"

"No question of disposition, House, but of sheer inability," Bond intervened, obviously to the inspector's disquiet.

"And you—so much of a friend of this Mr. Gregorescu as to be marrying his daughter, handing her affairs for her?"

"Which reminds me!" he added, as on a sudden recollection. "You're a great friend of this Miss Delma Vivian, who's been occupying Suite 42, aren't you? And Miss Vivian seems to have been a friend of this Mr. Gregorescu from certain information I've only just had come to me."

For once, Bond was taken aback and showed it.

He asked sharply, "What leads you to that conclusion, Inspector?"

"The floor-valet here says he took a letter from Mr. Gregorescu to Miss Vivian at her suite last evening. He states Mr. Gregorescu was very particular that he should hand the letter to Miss Vivian personally, as it was most important.'

Bond, anxious only to keep Delma right out of this business, had given no thought to the possibility that the delivery of that note would ever become known.

"I'm afraid you'll have to ask Miss Vivian about that," he suggested.

"That's going to be my next move," the Inspector said. "I might as well look her up now."

"I don't think you'll find her!" Bond remarked. "As I was coming up here she and Miss Gregorescu were just leaving the hotel. She was going back to Sunninghoime."

"And there again you're in the picture, Mr. Bond. Sunninghoime's your family place!" the Inspector observed ironically, his shrewd eyes seeming to be doing their utmost to see right through him.

"All the same, I'll verify your information," he said, picking up the room telephone.

Bond, who had seated himself at the writing-table, continued meantime to glance over the variety of papers which had been already systematically gone through and stacked in accordance with their individual interest. Some sort of order had been achieved out of what doubtless had earlier been chaos.

He knew very well that Gregorescu would never have had here any documents giving the smallest clue to the more intimate affairs of his life. So the search by the inquisitive House had no more immediate effect than saving Bond much time and trouble in sorting things out.

GARDEN for VICTORY

Grow Vitamins at Your Kitchen Door

EFFICIENT WAYS TO FEED VICTORY GARDEN PLOT

The method of applying plant feed to a newly spaced Victory Garden for vegetables depends largely on the size of the garden. If the garden is small, say 10 to 20 feet square, and the rows are close together, the plant food can be broadcast. If the ground was spaded in the fall and allowed to settle during the winter, the same plant food spreader that is used for the lawn can be used for the garden. If the soil is freshly spaded in the spring, the plant food can be spread by hand at the desired rate of 4 pounds per 100 square feet. In both cases the plant food should be raked into the soil after it has been spaded.

The easiest way to apply plant food to newly spaded soil in a larger garden, where rows are farther apart, is to place the plant food in a strip where each row is to be seeded. This, of course, would be before the furrows or "drills" are made for the seed. When your garden is all spaded and raked smooth and you are ready to plant, start where you want to make the first row. Take a pint of complete plant food in a shaker, like a large kitchen salt shaker, and scatter it in a strip about 6 inches wide for 25 feet of the row. This will be at the rate of a quart or 2 pounds for 50 feet of row and one-half pint or one-half pound for 12 1-2 feet of row (4 pounds per 100 square feet).

Now take a hoe or one of the various types of cultivating tools and work in the plant food in such a way that it is well mixed with the top 2 or 3 inches of soil. When this job is done well it will be difficult to see even a trace of the plant food particles in the soil. Leave this strip level and smooth as you finish working in the plant food.

SCATTER PLANT FOOD FROM LARGE SALT SHAKER, IN STRIP ABOUT 6 INS. WIDE DOWN THE ROW

After the plant food has been broadcast on a small garden and raked in, or applied in strips in a larger garden, raked in and leveled, you are then ready to make the furrows for the seed. The type of furrow you make depends on the type of seed you're planting. After planting, the seeds should be watered. It is always good practice, especially since an application of complete plant food has been made just before planting.

No Change Required In Legislation To Increase Pensions

OTTAWA, Feb., 18 —(CP)—Any provincial government desiring to increase old age pension payments, as has been done in British Columbia, may do so without the necessity of any change in the old age pension legislation, Finance Minister Ilsley told questioners in the House of Commons today.

He said he was not sure even a change in the old age pensions regulations would be necessary in the case of the British Columbia increase where the total of income of any pensioner is not to be in excess of $365 a year.

Spark that set Normandie ablaze Is recreated

NEW YORK, Feb. 17 — (CP) — The spark that set the Normandie afire has been recreated by navy investigators to strengthen their conviction that the blaze which ruined the former French liner was accidental and not caused by sabotage.

At Navy Yard, Brooklyn, officials set up a steel column similar to the one on which an acetylene-torch operator was working the afternon of Feb. 9. The man who had been working there in the Normandie took his place and near him stood the same men who were nearby on the ship—the overseer, helpers and asbestos shield handler.

Bales of life preservers, wrapped in tar paper and burlap, containing the same kapol as those on the Normandie, were set up near the steel column exactly as they had been placed on the ship.

The torch wielder went to work. In a few minutes, despite all precautions, the sparks shot past the shield into the burlap covering the life preservers and started a fire. The bundle burst into flame in a few seconds.

Censorship Interference Is Protested

OTTAWA, Feb. 17—(CP)—Censorship interference with mail addressed to members of Parliament was protested in the House of Commons yesterday by Opposition leader Hanson and echoed by Prime Minister Mackenzie King but the latter said that in time of war officials might err on the side of over-efficiency.

Mr. Hanson particularly protested the opening by a censor of an air mail letter addressed to him from Wolfville, N. S.

"This is an intolerable situation and one which members of this House cannot permit to continue," Mr. Hanson said.

"Some of my own mail has been similarly opened," Mr. King said, "and I protest just as thoroughly as he (Mr. Hanson) has done."

Mr. King said the matter would be investigated.

Mr. Hanson said there could be no question in the mind of the censor that the letter referred to had been addressed to him as leader of the Opposition. It was a harmless letter, he added, merely containing the writer's condemnation of the proposed plebiscite on the government's anti-conscription promises.

Mr. Hanson recalled that when a similar point was raised some days ago, Postmaster General Mulock had advised the House that any information taken from such letters was forwarded to the head of the department concerned.

"A Petty Gestapo"

This letter originated in the constituency of Finance Minister Ilsley and had there been anything in it of interest to him (Mr. Ilsley) presumably it would have been sent to that minister.

"This converts censorship into a petty Gestapo, spying on members of Parliament and others," Mr. Hanson declared.

It would be impossible for anybody to carry on as Opposition leader under such circumstances, Mr. Hanson declared, and he said he would throw the matter into "the court of public opinion" unless he had assurance from the government that the practice would cease.

"With respect to the underlying principles stated by my honorable friend I am in entire agreement with him," said Mr. King.

He believed, however, the letter mentioned by Mr. Hanson, and also one about which M. J. Coldwell, C. C. F. leader, complained some time ago were air mail letters from areas called "prohibited" for military reasons. He thought that might have been the reason the letters were opened.

"I shall take the matter up at once with the officials concerned and see if it is not possible to have occurrences of this kind prevented in future," said Mr. King.

Mr. Hanson said the House should know what the rules were. It was "charitable to assume some too officious official" was responsible.

Mr. King said he would rather say "over-conscientious official."

Mr. King asked Dr. Bruce to furnish the government with more information on that.
