The Maximum of Security

When knowledge, experience and caution be brought to bear upon their selection, Real Estate Mortgages afford investors the maximum of security. Over twenty-six million dollars of this Corporation's investments are in first mortgages on carefully selected improved real estate securities. These mortgages number 15,590, an average of $1,688 each, the securities therefore chiefly consisting of cultivated farm lands and residences of moderate size and cost in our leading cities. It is in these that the funds entrusted to our care by our debenture-holders are invested, thus assuring

EVERETT QUESTIONS SANDRA
CHAPTER LII.

The next morning at breakfast Everett read his paper in silence. He looked so stern I did not dare interrupt him. Before he left for the office, however, he said:

"I shall be at home early. Try and meet me without red eyes."

"Yes, Everett," was my inane reply.

"And please remain in doors today. Read or practice as you like." Again I answered:

"Yes, Everett." I seemed to have lost all the courage I had the night before, and could only say the most ordinary things to him—evidently what he expected, however, for he gave me a careless kiss and said:

"That's a good girl."

"A good girl!" I didn't want to be a good girl, I wanted to be like Leola, impulsive, indiscreet, so he would love me as he had loved her.

"I won't be good! I'll be just as bad as I know how to be," I said violently as I watched him go, swinging down the street. "Leola wasn't good, and you cared much more for her than you do for me. I just will not be good!" I stamped my foot childishly as I turned from the window.

"I wonder did he ever order Leola to stay indoors, and if she obeyed him?" I asked the question aloud. "I'll bet she didn't!" I resumed my soliloquy. "And I won't be treated so! I won't!" and again the ready tears flowed.

As I looked back, I think that had it not been for the ideas I had formed of Leola, her attitude toward life and toward Everett, I should have been far happier than I was, and probably should have been content to do the things Everett told me to do. But constantly I recall her terrible indiscretions, of which I know nothing, and had no means of finding out, were in my mind. But more than that was the jealousy caused because I had been told of Everett's love for her, which I believed was greater than that he gave me.

The Store for Waltham Watches

It was only a little after five when Everett came in. I had spent a miserable day, doing nothing he had advised, but walking aimlessly from one room to another, trying to kill time.

I thought of calling up Barrett Edmonds, but didn't quite dare for yet I knew that Barrett had escorted Rose and me to the theatre the night he came back. He would be sure to find it out, and it might make him unpleasant to Barrett—a thing I couldn't endure to consider. I had seen the effect of his actions upon Rose, and I wouldn't let him learn me before anyone else—especially before Barrett.

"What have you been doing all day?" "What have you read?" "Nothing—to both questions," was my apathetic answer. "You mean that you have neither read nor practised?" "Yes."

"No wonder you are fretful and unhappy. Moping about doing nothing and studying for you at once; and I'll expect you to adhere strictly to it."

I made no reply.

"Where had you and Miss Grandon been that evening I came back?" "To the theatre."

"By yourselves?" "No."

"Who was with you?" "Mr. Edmonds."

"How did he come to ask you?" "We met him while out in the motor. I introduced him to Rose, and then he asked if he might help entertain her since you were away."

"I forbade you to go out to places of amusement while I was away; to receive my wishes. I am very glad your friend had sense enough to go home," as he finished it seemed as if something broke in me and I exclaimed:

"I am glad too! you don't suppose I wanted her to stay and see how awfully unhappy you made me, do you? As it is she will tell everyone how I am treated—how you insulted her! I wanted her to go home and see Father and Mother and the boys. Now I never want to go home—I'd rather die! There isn't one of the boys or girls in the whole town who won't pity me for being married. They all said I wouldn't be happy if I married you, that you would not let me say my words were my own. But I didn't believe them. I do now!"

Tomorrow—Everett invites Edmonds to Supper.
