Father Can Now Lace His Boots

MARY SWEET, A RESIDENT OF HALIFAX, SAYS EVERYONE SHOULD KNOW ABOUT DRECO GAVE HER FATHER PROMPT RELIEF FROM RHEUMATISM AND STOMACH TROUBLE.

There is not a remedy on the market to-day having such a reputation as Dreco for its power to overcome rheumatism, stomach, bowel, kidney and bladder trouble.

Mary Sweet, 12 Yukon St., Halifax, N. S., writes: "For a long time my father has suffered from rheumatism. Every joint and muscle in his body ached. His feet would swell so badly it was impossible for him to get his boots on. He also had stomach, liver and kidney trouble. Gas would form after meals and he complained of having pains across his back, also dizzy spells and bad taste in his mouth in the mornings. His bowels were never regular as he always had to be taking something."

"My friends induced him to try Dreco. Now my father is quite regular. The swelling in his feet has gone, so that he can now put on his boots without any trouble. His stomach, liver and kidneys are in much better shape. There are no pains in his joints and muscles. "He has only taken one bottle as yet, but he fully intends to complete the treatment, as the results are wonderful and we have no need a big improvement in him. We would not hesitate to recommend Dreco to anyone, as we are thankful for what it has done for him in so short a time."

Dreco is being specially introduced in Charlottetown by E. A. Foster and is sold by good drug stores everywhere.

MUST QUIT PULLING TIGER'S COAT TAIL

NEW YORK, Dec. 2.—George Clemenceau has ordered Col. Bonaill, his "manager" to quit pulling his coat tail during speeches. The order was issued just before "the tiger" left New York for Chicago, and was the result of Bonaill's attempted interruption of the Boston speech. Bonaill feared that the French leader would seriously fatigue himself.

"MY WILD IRISH ROSE" At the Prince Edward Today and Tuesday

SCENE FROM "MY WILD IRISH ROSE" In "My Wild Irish Rose," Pauline Starke has one of the most appealing roles of her whole career. As Moya, the old priest's niece and housekeeper, she gives a delightful interpretation of a dainty, young Irish colleen. Moya falls in love with Conn the Shaughraun, the last being a local name for scapgrace and ne'er-do-we', and Father Dolan frowns on the match. In the end it is Conn's heroism and self-sacrifice that save the day all around.

A Sweetheart At Thirty

THE STORY OF A WOMAN'S TRANSFORMATION By Marion Rubincam

JIM AND JAMES Chapter 102

If I had thought that I would appreciate my new life the more after a taste of the old, I did well to come back to Henly Falls. But my motive, of course, was more than that. It was, really, to give Esther a chance to rest and see the city to get hold of herself once more, to be away from Jim long enough so each would feel the separation and enjoy the reunion.

So I stayed on at the farm longer than I had originally planned. And I fancy that I did make some little changes that were for the good.

"I'll get the water this morning before I go out to the barn," Jim would say, when we met in the kitchen before breakfast. There is nothing more depressing than a cold room with the sudden light of an early winter morning breaking through the windows, with an hour before breakfast, I dreaded getting out of bed so early, and starting the new cheerful day.

So Jim would go out to the pump and come back with buckets of water for me. As a rule, he went on to the outside work, and Esther, wrapped in a shawl brought in the water. "Don't get up when we do. Wait half an hour and I'll have the fire up and the kitchen warm for you. And so it happened that I was allowed a little more sleep and came down to a warm room, the tables set for me and various breakfast arrangements under way. And I was glad—not so much because of the shivers it spared me, but for the new thoughtfulness it showed.

In spite of this I caught a severe cold, since I was not used to the unevenly heated house. Upon this, Jim insisted on having a coal fire in my bedroom, and James offered to bring up coal for it and keep it going.

"But I don't like to take all this from you," I ventured one day.

"Guess I ain't offerin' you much luxury," Jim answered. "Anyway you're my sister."

"But you're offering me luxury you wouldn't offer your're wife," answered Jim. I did not answer, but I could tell by his expression that what I said had some effect on him.

One evening there was an entertainment in the Sunday School Rooms to which Jim and James escorted me. I wore one of my prettiest dresses on purpose—shabby though in some ways, since I had scarcely dared buy new clothes this winter, but new enough to the people in the village.

"Looks like a millionaire," was James' invariable comment when I wore something nice.

"Oh, by the way," I said trying to sound casual, "Esther can't do some things cheaply now. I see that all the stores are having sales. You'd better send her some money now if you are going to at all."

"She wouldn't spend it on herself," Jim protested.

"Wouldn't she try her and see?" And Jim did, as I learned later.

Every day I had a short note from Francis. He was working hard, but each evening, from his club, he sent me some message. And he had the daily papers mailed up to me, and some magazines as well. These I put on the table in our sitting room, though there was little enough time to read any of them.

But I found Jim enjoying the city papers, as well as the one paper he formerly permitted himself. So I wrote Francis to send him a subscription to an agricultural paper, and to James a magazine of mechanics and inventions.

"Never saw so much mail," James remarked each time he brought in the letters and papers. And indeed it was the day's bright spot for me—for Violet wrote too though her letters were not cheerful, and occasionally there was word from Esther.

"You mustn't think me a miser," Jim said one evening. "I was going to send you enough money to keep you and Vi to the end of the term anyway. She's my daughter and I've let you do more for her than I've done myself."

This was a confession—from Jim I took it up quickly.

"It won't matter now. I'm going to let Francis send her on through college, and while we are away on our wedding trip, she will live at the college. But I wish you'd take that money and put in a hot water system—you've no idea the time and work and strength you'd save Esther."

"But the price—"

"No more than you offered to send to Vi," I said. "It needn't be so elaborate. A tank in the attic—you already have the windmill for pumping water to the barn—some piping, a pump in the kitchen so Esther needn't go out doors for every pail of water, a coal connected with the stove—"

Eventually that, too, was arranged. And so, little by little, I did make things smoother and happier for Esther's home-coming.

I had been there a month when I got a letter from Vi, asking me to come back, and telling me, eventually of the ending of the case in which Bud's good name was involved. I opened the letter with a little feeling of fear.

MAN INSIDE THE CLOTHES

MOGADORE, Dec. 2.—The other day as yours truly was standing on a corner until 2.45 for the 2.15 p. m. street car, two well dressed men were talking near by, when an old peddler came up and offered his stock of shoe strings, hair pins, buttons, needles, garters, an such.

The peddler was very old, pretty ragged and had white hair hangin' to his shoulders. He had a good face that time and trouble had mapped pretty considerable and his hand trembled as he held out his poor little stock of goods, with a word or two about his need to make a sale.

"Get out of here!" one of the men commanded. "You peddlars are a nuisance. You had your chance, like we did, and if you are in hard luck, it's your own fault. You're an apology of a man. Git, I say!"

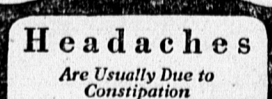

"Say, wait a minute!" quietly said the other man. "You're not an apology. You're a fact. You are old, poor, ragged and probably hungry, as you say, but I don't know what your chance was or how you were beat out of it. Most men a your age in your fix would simply beg or steal or avoid work by goin' to a poorhouse. I'll take 15 hair pins, 75 needles and 11 yards of garter tape. Here's your money."

I don't know who this fellow in the good clothes was. I don't know who the fellow in the rags was. But by thunder! I'll bet that some time 'way back they started with similar chances. The one won; the other lost. And clothes spoiled neither of 'em.
