Gleanings Here And There

love-making until mischievous Cavag interfered. Flora had a beautiful cat which she prized. This cat was brought home when an infant by a sister who was now dead. During one of Hector's courtship visits Cavag made a savage attack on the feline beauty. This Flora resented and words followed till finally they met with the cold look of strangers, all brought about by a troublesome cur. In December, 1847, Sir Donald Campbell, then a Scotch noble, became Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island. Naturally the Scotch folk of Big Woods were pleased. Hector and his mother were delighted at having a fellow-clansman represent the Queen, a man whom they could converse with in the language of Eden, whenever they found it convenient to call. Early on a bright morning of the following June, Hector dressed in his clan attire, started out to visit the Governor, leaving Cavag at home. But he had not gone far, when he was after him. Like many excellent men Hector did not understand about door-bells, and on arriving at Government House he continued knocking, each tap getting louder. At length an Irish servant came to the door, and seeing a countryman in homespun, exclaimed: "What do you mean, disturbing his honor at this time of the mornin'?" Sure you'd waken the devil wid yer racket and yep?

Though Hector could understand what was said in the current tongue, he was greatly confused on attempting to speak it. He undertook to explain that being a Campbell he was no doubt related to the Governor and might expect some indulgence. "Oh, yer a Campbell, are yer? Devil a pin Mike Doonan cares if ye were a drummer as for been related, share his honor has bushels and tons of such relations—poor relations I'm thinkin'." Hector was angry enough to twist the varlet's neck, but he would not lower himself to attack a servant. So he waited till an attendant invited him into the library where Sir Donald was sitting. One of Hector's mistakes was that of supposing the Governor was at home in the language of Eden, so he began with the musical Gaelic to describe his pedigree from the lordly house of Argyle. He only got started when Cavag, after a lightning trip through the mansion, entered the library where a favorite hound was quietly sleeping. The unruly Cavag had him by the throat in an instant, the uproar destroying the Gaelic interview. Hearing the noise of battle, three other dogs rushed to the scene, each one trying to shake the cur from Big Woods. Hector, perspiring with shame, tied his best, with kicks and verbal abuse to end the fight, but they paid no heed even to his Gaelic, a language unsurpassed for conveying abuse. Chairs, flower-pots, everything not securely fastened, were quickly overturned by the sanguinary baste. In his desperation, Hector grabbed a fishing rod to quell the combatants, but the weapon being unwieldy, by accident knocked off its stand a bust of MacCaellin Mor, the distinguished head of the clan. Sir Donald was speechless; was the scene before him a dream or a frightful reality? Soon the warriors entered the dining room, where they met a girl carrying a large tray of dishes, who was knocked over and the crockery was smashed into pieces. Fortunately, when they reached the kitchen the cellar hatch was open, and down went all the fighters, thus ending for a time the fray. As usual, calm followed storm. Hector informed the Governor he was greatly disappointed in the good old tongue; he should set about learning. As for Cavag, having been reared in the country where dogs are always fighting, he was ignorant of rules in gentlemen's houses, hence the mistake on hearing Hector's explanation. Sir Donald was somewhat pleased and amused. On one point, his orders were positive—if Cavag returned to Big Woods, he must return in a coffin, and he directed an attendant to shoot the troublesome cur. When Hector reached home his mother asked him concerning his visit and about all where did he leave the dog? With a sad heart, he related the story ending with the execution of Cavag. Though Hector's visit did not recall pleasant memories, it was productive of good. Flora and Hector entertained kindly feelings toward each other. Cavag being out of the way, it did not take long to rekindle the old fires of love. So three months from the notable visit, the two were made one. Governor Campbell died in October, 1859, in the fiftieth year of his age, much mourned and regretted. Hector, loyal and true to his clan, attended the funeral.

Ernest Cameron and his son, David, of Hampton, are visiting in Alberton, the guests of his brother-in-law, Dr. Purdy. A student from Mount Allison preached on the eighth for Rev. Mr. Somers, of the Tryon Circuit. His mother-in-law, Mrs. Gosvenor, is still in the P. E. I. Hospital. There is no improvement in her condition. To arrest the progress of zangerine in her foot, an operation may be necessary. It is doubtful if the patient would survive the shock. Mr. Park Rogerson, of Victoria, has been ill with an affected foot. His many friends are hoping he may soon be quite well. "Marry my daughter? Certainly not! She is too young—" "Well, may I be first in the queue when the rush starts?"
