CHAPTER XXVI

The staff was as exhausted as Emily. One of the girls, a last year's debutante, came up to Emily. "Would you mind terribly if I had a drink?"

"No, at all, darling," Emily said. "You deserve one." She turned to some of the others who had already put on their coats. "Any of you care for anything? Let's have our own little party in peace."

Emily and her girls were joined by Billy and Mr. Roth. "I know what you mean," Emily said. "We can post-mortem up in my office."

She looked about at the floor littered with cigarette stubs, the remnants of canapés, glasses sitting about. "I really can't stand this any more."

They all sprawled about comfortably enjoying the relaxation. Billy made the drinks and passed them. Emily slipped off her shoes and stretched out on the chaise longue.

She listened to the talk but her mind was not on it. She did not realize that she had fallen asleep until she felt Billy's arm and looked up to see him standing over her. "Come on, honey. Come on," he was saying. "We'd better go home. You'll feel better."

It seemed to Emily that there was hardly a woman in New York who could afford to visit her place who was not already doing so.

She thought briefly of cutting her overhead and acquiring, in the way wide trade and cheaper prices. But that would not do.

And Gabriel, the coltifer, whom she had stolen from a rival because everyone said he was the best in town. If Gabriel were kept every minute of the day he could never earn the salary she had to give him.

Her secretary—another expense—buzzed at that moment and entered with two middle-aged ladies from Charleston who had come to New York expressly to see Karin. With them, Emily was gracious and charming for an hour, noting that it would be worth the effort.

After work she taxied downtown to see Roth. He was alone in his office, the dropped bag on his desk and, sitting on the arm of a chair, told him of her worries.

"Give it time, give it time, Emily," he told her when she had finished. "You can't expect everything to happen overnight."

"That's just it, Mr. Roth. The way that place is gauged, I don't see how it can ever show a profit."

"I know. And that's the shame of it—where the point in making money here if we lose it all in the salon?"

Roth spun about slowly in the swivel chair. "You know, I got an idea the salon, like you call it, is the main reason we're hitting this boom."

"You really don't mind, do you?" "Not at all." He dropped the club and sat beside her. "I know what we can do."

He looked at her suddenly, but there was a smile on his face and she answered it. "Now, you know what I mean," she said.

It was after nine o'clock when she let herself into her apartment. Billy, in his shirt sleeves, was putting golf balls into an apron.

"Hello, baby." He stopped the dance record on the phonograph and walked to her. She held up her head for a kiss. "How's tricks?" he asked her.

"Evening, darling." She went to the couch, slumped on it and took off her hat. "Oh, dear, I hope you haven't waited for me. I didn't have a chance to call."

Hospital Assn. Concludes Meet

By DOUGLAS GREEN
(Canadian Press Staff Writer)

OTTAWA, Sept. 10 (CP)—Dr. H. Carpenter, of Winnipeg, Chairman of the Hospital Administration and Finance Committee, suggested today before the Seventh Biennial Meeting of the Canadian Hospital Council that hospitals soon will have to investigate the question of higher pay and shorter hours for nurses.

"Nurses don't like an eight-hour day on a broken shift starting at 7 a.m. and ending at 7 p.m.," said Dr. Carpenter. "Something will have to be done to meet the situation."

"Also we have to face the principle that six days generally are recognized as a working week."

At today's concluding session of the seven-day meeting, the Council passed resolutions asking: 1. That Selective Service authorities provide that the seven-day separation period between the time an employee gives notice and the time he is permitted to leave his job

Big Nazi Ships Make Raid on Spitzbergen

By Ernest Agnew
Associated Press Staff Writer

LONDON, Sept. 10 (AP)—The transient German fleet, which long has been trying to break through the ice, stormed into action in force against the tiny, valiant garrison of Spitzbergen Wednesday, the Norwegian High Command reported tonight in a communique.

The official report did not make clear whether any Germans remained after the raid on the island, 600 miles east of Greenland. Neither did it say whether any of the small Norwegian force stationed there escaped.

Both the Norwegian report and a broadcast by the German Agency D. N. B. said the defenders put up stout resistance. The D. N. B. said the attack was made to destroy the meteorological station which had been aiding the British and seemed to indicate no Germans were left behind as a garrison.

"As regards captains and chief engineers, we have already decided that we have no jurisdiction, these coming under the salaries order," the Board said.
