EARLY CHECKS NOW PAYING PRODUCERS

Poultry raisers were urged early this year by Poultry Services, Dominion Department of Agriculture to buy or hatch chicks a month to two months earlier than usually so as to make eggs available in the fall and winter for export to Great Britain. They are now benefiting by the pay-off. Two cars of new crop eggs were offered to the Special Products Board on August 22, for shipment to Great Britain against the British egg contract. This was a full month earlier than in 1946, and the 1947 early hatched pullets should enable producers to continue egg deliveries throughout the fall and winter, when Britain wants them most and pays a premium for them, say officials of the Department. Announcement has been made officially through the British Food Mission, that the agreement with Canada for the sale of eggs and egg products extending to the end of January, 1948, will not be affected by measures being taken by Britain to strengthen her economic position.

Discusses Harvesting

movement of air through the quarters after the tubers are placed in the storage, is very necessary. This ventilation will allow the surfaces of the tubers to dry, keep the humidity down, and thus greatly lessen the losses from late blight tuber rot in cases where tubers have been inoculated with blight spores during digging operations. "Potatoes should not be harvested before the tops are completely dead. If the tops are green, or even partially green, and very soon the tubers exhibit the bronze discoloration characteristic of late blight rot. Other rot-producing organisms gain entrance into the tubers through the blight rot lesions and hasten the rotting process.

"A dry, well-ventilated storage, as advised above, will cause many of the blight spores to dry out and die before they have germinated and invaded the tubers. Many spores which may be on the tubers will be destroyed by the drying effect of sun and wind if the tubers are permitted to lie for a while in the field before being picked up. The digger should be kept well ahead of the pickers. This practice will also result in the establishment of a lower initial humidity in the storage because the potatoes will be dried off before entering the building.

Vine Killers

"Killing the vines by spraying them with one of the several vine killers on the market is a practice that is strongly recommended. Ten days to two weeks after the plants are thus destroyed no danger of inoculating the tubers with blight spores exists and the tubers enter the storage in a healthy condition.

"The destruction of the vines by chemical means offers other advantages. Oversized tubers, which may result in a considerable financial loss in seasons of long and favorable growth conditions, may be avoided by destroying the vines when the tubers have reached the desired size. The vine-killing chemicals make us independent of nature and we are not now compelled to wait for killing frosts, which may be abnormally late in some years, to kill down the vines.

"The time for applying the top killer should be carefully determined because it is very necessary to allow a space of ten to fourteen days between the killing of the vines and the digging of the crop. This interval gives the tubers time to loosen from the stolons and the skins time to toughen so that the potatoes are less susceptible to mechanical injury during digging and subsequent handling. Allowance should be made for this necessary ripening or toughening period when planning the killing and harvesting dates. The Sebago is particularly easy to bruise and the toughening period is especially important for this variety.

Danger Of Rot

"The growers will recall that a great deal of rot was found in our potatoes arriving on the market in the Southern States last winter, although the tubers were in apparently good condition when they were shipped out of the Province. Some of this rot was induced by low temperature injury, a light frost having occurred before these late varieties were harvested. This injury could have been avoided if the plants had been killed by a chemical and harvested before the danger of frost threatened. Most of the rot was induced by soil organisms known as Fusaria which entered the tubers through bruises, bruises which were not sufficiently apparent to be noticed by the graders, inspectors, and others handling the crop.

"Because the mild open weather of last autumn kept the vines in a green state the skin of the tubers was not ripened or toughened and the tubers were very easily bruised even by light blows. "It has been noted many times that the potatoes on one side of a bag were more bruised or showed more rotted areas than on the opposite side of the bag. This observation clearly indicates that the bags were dropped rather than placed on the floor of the truck, warehouse, or rail car by careless handlers.

"Potatoes in bags, particularly Sebago, should be handled with reasonable care to prevent bruising. Even a short drop to a concrete floor may produce abrasions of the skin of sufficient magnitude to permit the entrance of rot-producing organisms such as Fusaria. "It is strongly recommended that all potato fields in which the plants are not dead through natural causes such as normal maturity or light frosts be not later than October 1, be sprayed with a chemical top killer. This destruction of the tops, together with the allowance of a toughening period of not less than ten days, and preferably not less than fourteen days for Sebago will result in the harvesting of sound, healthy tubers for both domestic use and export."
