THE RED VULTURE BY FREDERICK SLEATH

"It does," admitted the inspector. "At the same, I fancied I heard some one shifting about out there, and I don't let impressions like that simply fade away. Here's something that I didn't stage. Do you see that?" He held up his left hand. The middle finger had been lately bandaged. "Lost the point of it," he said coolly. "Shot away. Just outside. They have every approach of this place picketed." "Why?" "The Children of the Vulture," replied the inspector patiently. "They tried to stop me coming up here. Isn't that a pretty good reason for me connecting you up with them? They have been laying pretty frequently for me lately, I'll admit, but they had no reason to expect me in this quarter at such a time of the morning apart from you. Now I'll try you once more. I'll tell you frankly the theory I've got about you. Great believer in the method! Wonderful what I pick up with it sometimes. You have been mixed up with those damned Children in some way, in their pay or something. You broke with them. You were in hiding. And when those fools of policemen caught you, you were coming to me to give them away. Am I right?" "You are not." "Where do I go wrong?" "Altogether." "Oh, no. I admit I haven't been round to Cratmyll's to see whether you really weren't doing something besides hide there. That's an assumption. I'll confirm or correct it presently. The in-their-pay business is another assumption, which I can't confirm or correct unless you help me, leastways, not at present. But the rest is independent of you or me. It's a fact, and you know it. Why else did they lay to stop me coming here? Why else did they lay for you? You needn't think that swell was after the sergeant. Sergeant's a fresh transfer from The Ditch and never been up against a swell in his life. He was after you. You know something, and they mean to close your mouth. You're up against it. Look here, young fellow," he said earnestly—the telephone bell rang at his elbow but he ignored it. "For your own sake you had better put me wise. They'll get you here. You can do nothing to stop them. I can. Oh, dash the thing!" He jerked the receiver out of its catch and flung it down, angered by a renewed ringing and John Henry's blank stare. "I can," he repeated, resuming quite calmly. "What are you afraid of? I'll guarantee to keep you safe and to clear you if you are mixed up with them. And I'm the only man who can do it." "Thanks—for nothing," said John Henry with deliberate sarcasm. "I don't know what you are talking about." "Get out," said the inspector contemptuously. "I simply can't understand you," he continued. "You served in the War. Oh, yes, you did! Don't you realize you are shielding a lot who want to do-in the whole giddy Empire? And you are white—aristocrat, if I'm not mistaken. They are mostly tar-brush—dirty." "Not that it matters to the what they are," he admitted candidly, as he saw John Henry's dry smile. "I'm only trying to touch you up with what I think will touch you up. Black, white, or color, there's only criminal and non-criminal to Ernie Branluk. And the one tries to keep out of his way when he's on duty, and—" he began to smile also, slyly, ruefully—"the other does the same when he's off. So folks like you have to provide him with company, or what would the poor fellow do?" "Meanwhile any one might be listening at the other end of that 'phone," John Henry remarked. "The inspector's big hand at once covered the receiver. "Thanks," he said. "I'd have noticed that myself ordinarily. But the Children are my great bugbear, and you are the hottest trail I've ever hit. Come now. Are you going to take me in with you on what you are trying to do? ... You see," he said, grinning. "I've tumbled to you all right. You're after them, too, but you want to go solo. You had far better give me the chance to come in. I've got more tricks than you. Gosh!" he exclaimed, and his grin disappeared. "I'll spoil your hand if you don't. They struck at me before I knew I was doing them any harm. At me! Do you hear? They're mine!" His malevolence had suddenly possessed and transfigured him; he had become almost maniacal, he was snarling. "You either come in with me, or—I'll let them have you." Seeing the fury of the little pig eyes, John Henry realized that the hatred of this man against Carse and his gang was almost as great as his own. It had become an obsession—because they had struck at him before he knew he was doing them any harm! He was not the man to trust with Clara's welfare. "Well?" He made no reply. Some one knocked at the door. "Come in," snapped the inspector. "A staff sergeant entered. 'Beg pardon, Inspector,' he said apologetically. 'But I don't think you have answered that call yet. It's for you from the Chief. I switched it straight through.' 'Damn! What do they want now?' Branluk muttered, waving the sergeant away, and taking up the instrument. 'Hello, hello... Yes!' His expression underwent an instant change. He seemed to listen with very great intentness. 'Right,' he muttered at last. While replacing the receiver, he said grimly—'There's been another assassination.' 'District Commissioner, home on leave,' he continued, turning to face John Henry. 'Distinguished himself by suppressing a native riot a few weeks ago. Now they've got him. Same people. We've got the man... That seems to interest you?' The last words seemed a challenge. He rose as though for another and more determined attack. Instead, he walked out of the room, far and away the most impressive revelation of character that he had given. John Henry could hardly realize that he had gone. (To be continued)

Hansel and Grethel COLOR CUT-OUTS

LOST This is one day's chapter of the story of "Hansel and Grethel." If every day you will soon have a whole set of dolls with which to act out this fairy tale.

Early the next morning the stepmother called the children to get ready. She gave them each a tiny piece of bread which was all that they could have all day. Hansel did not eat his, but crumbled it in his pocket. As they went through the woods he walked behind and strewed bread crumbs along the way. This time they went farther into the woods and left the children alone in the heart of the forest. The children waited for the moon to rise but when Hansel tried to follow the bread crumbs he could not find his way, for the birds and the animals had eaten them all up. The harder they worked to find their way out of the forest, the deeper into the woods they went. (Here is little Grethel's best dress. Color it blue with shoes and stockings to match. Don't you wonder what will happen to the children tomorrow?)

Enjoyable Concert At Wheatley River By Sandy MacGregor

One of the most successful concerts ever held in the Wheatley River Hall was put on last Friday evening in aid of the Wheatley River War Memorial fund, and a splendid sum was realized from the proceed. The entertainment was in charge of Mr. Sandy MacGregor, whose numbers were ably supplemented by the efforts of local and Charlottetown talent. For nearly three hours an audience that crowded the hall was kept in spontaneous laughter, as the agreeable Sandy rendered selection after selection, and after complete change of costume; popular Harry Lauder and other Scotch selections were followed throughout the whole program. Sandy drew from his inexhaustible fund of humor; his many local hits were greeted with loud applause and laughter. The last number, a cleverly carried out female impersonation, carried the audience by storm and proved a fitting climax to a most enjoyable entertainment. The other numbers were also of high order evoking prolonged applause, and the different performers were favorably noted to respond to insistent requests. An auction sale of candy was very efficiently conducted by Mr. J. H. Buntin, M. L. A. who in conjunction with Captain D. A. MacDonald and Sandy MacGregor, also took advantage of the occasion provided to emphasize the appropriateness of lasting monuments for the commemoration of the boys who fought and fell in the Great War. No effort was too great, they stressed, by which fitting honor could be done to those who had made the supreme sacrifice. During the passing of a vote of thanks to Sandy MacGregor and the other performers, mention was made of the fact that the famous Scottish comedian had recently visited the town, and that the Wheatley River schools, where he addressed the pupils along patriotic lines, stressing particularly all-giance to the flag, one of which he said he would like to see flying from the roof of every island school-house. Followed by the program, during which Miss Ruth Dickieson and Miss Alma Blaquiere acted as accompanists.

Never Met Its Equal For Healing!

Writing from Saulnierville, Digby Co., N.S., Mr. John M. Theriault says:—"We find Zam-Buk a splendid household healer for cuts, burns and other accidents and skin ailments of common occurrence. 'One of my sons tried Zam-Buk for his boils and it did him such a lot of good, that I decided to give the balm a trial for piles, from which I had been troubled for over two years. 'Before one box of Zam-Buk was finished, I had derived such ease and comfort that I continued with the treatment. In a comparatively short time I had gained permanent relief from the piles. Zam-Buk proved equally good for chapped hands, cracked lips, etc. 'I've never met its equal for healing."

MORE HUMOURS OF HISTORY

A. D. 1195.—Chess was introduced into England by the returning Crusaders.
