A Sweetheart At Thirty

THE STORY OF A WOMAN'S TRANSFORMATION

By Marion Rubincam

THE HAINES FAMILY

Chapter 3

Self-revelation begins with a looking glass! Most women spend a lot of time before a glass—a statement that will please most cynical minded men. Few of us spend enough time of rather spend the time before the glass to the best advantage. No man will agree with me in that, I know, but nevertheless it is true.

As is usual with most fairly busy women, I looked in the glass about twice a day—once in the morning when I combed my hair, and plinned on the collar of my house-dress; once at night when I took out the hairpins before going to bed. But I never saw myself in the mirror while performing these mechanical motions—that is, I looked at my reflection tucked in some of the wisps of hair that the hairpins did not catch, and fixed the collar straight—but I never actually saw myself.

Not until the day when all this great change began to take place. That day, carrying the mended curtains over to the mirror, I looked—actually looked—long and critically and impersonally at myself. This is what I saw: A staid woman with some what bent shoulders, straight hair so colorless and so without life or lustre that it might be gray or muddy brown—it had no real color. Fine lines ran over the forehead and around the eyes. The mouth sagged, there were coarse lines visible on the nose. Two deep lines were grooved around the mouth; the lips were colorless and drooped at the corners with a suggestion of eternal disappointment. There were lines on the neck too, especially where the white collars I always wore on my street serge, pressed against the skin.

Whatever figure I might possess, was so lost under the blighting, cheerless house-dress, that no definite lines were visible. Altogether, the woman who presented herself to me in the glass might have been forty-eight, might have been sixty, or even seventy. She was so colorless that not even her age was definite. And this was I, two days past my thirty-fifth birthday! As I turned another image came into the glass. Violet, entering the room saw me and laughed. (Then slipping up behind me and touching my chin on my shoulder and looking in the glass with me. Her youth and vitality only made me seem older.)

"You're nice eyes aunt Enid," she said. "They look so young."

I had not noticed my eyes in my scrutiny. I looked again—yes, my eyes were young. They were the only remnant of my youth left—eyes of a clear, brown. But whatever pleasure I felt at discovering my one good point was lost in dejection over the bad ones. Violet, guessing this, laid down her books and heaped me with the curtains.

"It's nice to be young, VI," I said to her. She paused in her work—she was standing on a chair slipping these fresh curtains over her brass rods.

"It's not nice to be too young," she said.

"Why? It's a fault soon enough overcome," and I sighed as I laid it.

"Well it would be nice to be a year or so older," Violet urged. "Mother says I'm too young to go out alone with Bud, and that she doesn't want me to get any notions in my head about him, or any one else."

"And you shouldn't." I always tried to back up Esther's words. "I don't care about the others, only about Bud." Violet having carefully fringed the clean curtains jumped lightly from the chair. "I'll never like anyone but Bud. You may smile if you want and say I'm too young to know—but I'm not. Besides," illogically, "I'm not young—I'm nearly 18, and I'm to graduate this June. This suggested another subject at once. Violet hopped from topic to topic, like a conversational bird.

"I want you to do lots and lots of drawn work on my dress," she said eagerly. "You will, won't you that's a dear! You're the little aunt!" her quick moving little hands were tucking in stray locks of hair as she coaxed me. "Mother will let me have the white voile she bought last year and never made up and a lovely white ribbon sash. And you're to do draw-work on it, in squares—I'll show you how I want it."

We gathered up the curtains and went on with our work while she discussed her dress and young Bud. Pearsall alternately came up to us.

"Supper's ready."

"So we went down together, to the table set at one side of the big farmhouse kitchen. Jim was there, already eating, and Jimmie waiting for us. Esther was dish-ing things from the stove. Laura the oldest girl, was not home. As we sat down, I began to observe my family—having begun to observe myself.

We all looked as though we had let go of life, we older ones—and we had.

For life had once held out its hands to us, as it does to everyone at some time or other—but we had not had imagination enough to take her gifts. Was it too late?

This I was to find out.

To me—More about the family

Japan's Price for Aid in Great War

(William Howard Gardiner, in The North American Review.)

They point out that, except for tardy action against the German raiders in the Pacific and except for conveying troops from Australia, Japan did nothing of the belated nature during the war except to her own advantage in the Far East—and this in spite of the fact that the Entente was in dire need of troops and that Japan kept an exceedingly large army mobilized in the East during most of the war.

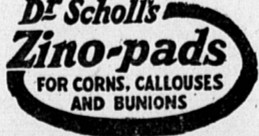

The point of interest here is not her subsequent acquisition of all the former German islands north of the Equator, nor her consolidation of her hold on Manchuria, nor her seeming attempt to remain in Shanghai, nor her still lingering in Siberia, but rather her failure to enter the war promptly alongside her ally, Great Britain and her failure to support the Entente in force after she did go in and when the Allies were in dire need of troops. This delay has been explained in many highly informed quarters by the statement that Japan spent the first three weeks of the war in trying to exact a special price from Great Britain for the promise of Japanese co-operation in force—a deal of inestimable value to the German raiders and Pacific Squadron. And Japan's address later to cooperate in force similarly has been explained as being due in part to her failure to get her price and in part to developments in Europe ensuing from this situation. For reports from Europe, Asia and Australasia are to the effect that the Japanese had offered to enter the war immediately and permanent cession to Japan of a string of local British possessions and naval base facilities extending from the Indian Ocean through the Straits of Malacca and up the China Coast—as well as a certain position ultimately in Europe which does not concern us here.

LOCKS ITS DOORS ON GENTLER SEX

LONDON, Aug. 7.—Oxford University now admits women freely to its degrees and to university membership, but Cambridge still locks its doors against them. Naturally the women do not feel a bit grateful for such glimpses. They want the doors unlocked.

The women from the Cambridge colleges of Newham and Girton have demanded admission to degrees and university membership on the same terms as men. Not long ago some 2,000 of them signed a petition to this effect. The reply given by the university was polite, but unsatisfactory.

Within the last two years Cambridge has voted and countervoted in various proposals to admit women. The only proposal which has actually been carried—and to this practical effect has not yet been given—is that women who are qualified for degree status may obtain "titles of degrees," but not real degrees.

In making this half-hearted offer Cambridge is proposing to treat women just as it formerly treated Jews and Nonconformists, whom also it tried to satisfy with the titular degree until parliament stepped in and compelled the university to abolish its discriminations of creed.

Now women want parliament to interfere and compel Cambridge to abolish its discriminations against their sex. And signs are not lacking that Cambridge itself is beginning to see that it will not pay to keep the women knocking at their doors much longer.

A deputation consisting of several members of parliament, the heads of Girton and Newham Colleges and other friends of the movement recently talked with Mr. Fisher, minister of education. The minister made it quite plain that he was on the side of the women and would do all he could to persuade Cambridge to open its doors to them. Parliament also was undoubtedly on their side. Cambridge was looking for a grant from the exchequer, he said, but it was not likely parliament would vote it while Cambridge continued to exclude women. If Cambridge found that by keeping women out the needed money also would be kept out she would probably decide quite to let them in. It might not therefore become necessary to employ Legislative pressure to force her to open her doors.
