THE STORY OF A WOMAN'S TRANSFORMATION

By Marion Rubincam

WHEN BUD CAME
Chapter 74

We were destined not to go on very much longer in our quiet and uneventful way of living. But for a while there was peace—the peace that goes before a storm.

"I don't understand why Bud doesn't come so much,' Vi confided one evening. It was getting quite chilly out of doors now, and our little living room with its low shaded lamp, looked very warm and cozy.

There was one thought of, course, that was always in her mind. It was that Bud might tire of her, or that he might find someone else more attractive, But she rarely spoke of this.

Tonight Toby Markham came in and later Helen joined us. The four of us sat about the little antique table in the living room, playing bridge—I was learning this too, as well as dancing. And the science of this highly complicated game interested me intensely.

We were busily playing when Bud came in.

"I'm awfully late its 10 o'clock,' he apologized. "But I saw lights in the window and risked it."

He gave Toby a not particularly friendly glance, as we went on with our game. When it was over, Toby and Vi won the rubber, and Toby put his hand over the table to shake hands at their victory. He held Vi's hand an instant too long—grinning his impish, delightful little grin at her. Toby was one of the merriest souls in that part of the city.

Helen glanced from this little tableau to Bud with the most amused expression. Then she looked at me to see whether I also had noticed it. Bud certainly looked gloomy enough; he looked, as a matter of fact, tired to death, and the sight of Toby holding Vi's hand, even for a second, brought a scowl to his face.

Shall we make some hot coffee? he asked I'm all in."

Vi rose at once always glad when she could do something to please Bud. But Helen had other plans.

"I was just going to suggest it," she announced. "I brough over some cold chicken from the restaurant, it's all cut up. We'll have some cold chicken salad. Take Toby along—he makes cuch nice dressing for salads."

So she manoeuvered it so that Toby and Vi were alone in the kitchen, Bud still displeased lay down on the couch and made no pretense of talking with us.

He lingered after the others left and I excused myself and went in to the bedroom, shutting the door But parts of their talk came to me even so, for the city was quiet and there was no sound in our house.

"Are you crazy over that chap?" I heard him ask.

Vi for once had a litle reserve.

"Why?" was all she asked.

"He's chazy about you. I don't wonder, there's half a dozen of them around here would be in love with you if you didn't hold them ten miles off.

"I'm glad you do,' he went on a little later. "Otherwise I might have no chance at all. Lord knows I'm not much but at least I'm as good as they are.

"What do you mean?' Vi asked.

I mean—oh, I'm crazy tonight I guess I'm plain jealous if that Markham chap. But he wouldn't be much better than I. He's sober and plodding and all that sort of thing——'

"Bud!' Vi cried, and laughed a little. "What are you talking about? What has poor Toby's plodding qualities got to do with anything?

"Well, they say that sort makes good husbands," Bud said hesitating a little.

"But I don't want—"Vi began.

"Vi, I'm crazy about you!' It came out suddenly, like that, in the middle of her sentence. And though we all knew Bud was in love with her, and though she knew it too, in spite of frequent doubts when Bud did not come for a day at a time—still, when he said it, it left her a little breathless.

"Bud dear," she began, her voice so low I could scarcely hear it.

There was all the pleading in the world in his tones—all the weakness and all the strength of a man.

It was the irresistible plea. A woman may deny every other sort of love in a man, but she cannot resist that—"I need you" It appeals to her not only as a woman but as a mother, and in every woman the maternal instinct is strong. Vi did not want to resist.

"Bud dear,' I heard her say again her voice a little tremulous.

And then there was a little silence, the sound of a chair being moved, and silence again. But it was a quiet that fairly vibrated.

I tried not to hear what they said but in our tiny apartment it was almost impossible not to. I was in bed by this time, and I turned to the wall and pulled the covers over my ears.

But even so I heard the girl's low trembling little laugh. And the murmur of the boy's voice and occasionally a word of endearment.

"Are you going to marry me" he asked once.

"Do you think I could ever marry anyone else? Vi answered gently.

So it was settled definitely! I felt suddenly as though a great calamity as well as a great joy had taken place. I knew well enough that Vi would never marry anyone else. She had been in love with Bud Pearsoll for several years, from their early high school days, and there would never have been another man for her. She was that type.

And she now promised to him. But would he make her happy? Was it a wise thing after all?

I was to find out later.

Fiery, Itching Skin Is Quickly Soothed With This Sulphur

Mentho-Sulphur, a pleasant cream, will soothe and heal skin that is irritated or broken out with eczema; that is covered with ugly rash or pimples, or is rough or dry. Nothing subdues fiery skin eruptions so quickly, says a noted skin specialist.

The moment this sulphur preparation is applied the itching stops and after two or three applications, the eczema is gone and the skin is delightfully clear and smooth. Sulphur is so precious as a skin remedy because it destroys the parasites that cause the burning, itching or disfigurement. Mentho-Sulphur always heals eczema right up.

A small jar of Rowles Mentho-Sulphur may be had at any good drug store.

"Broken Wing"

A Jump-spark Romance of Modern Mexico

BY PAUL DICKEY AND CHAS. W. GODDARD

From the Sensationally Successful Play Novelized by Charles W. Goddard.

Inez went to bed with a confident smile and her usual prayer, reminding the Omnipotent that he must fix it somehow.

Farley, who believed in prayer voiced his helplessness and in other words said just about the same thing.

General Innocencio, far away mending his political fences, went to sleep swearing—(which is a sort of profane prayer)—because Sylvester Cross had been gone nearly a month and sent no word of progress.

Basilio never prayed except when he was in trouble—and just now he was not in trouble. In fact the rascal slept the so-called sleep of the just.

None would have slept had they known what the morrow would bring forth.

CHAPTER IX.

The next morning the Medico sat in the front cock pit of the machine to handle the spark and gas lever while Phil grasped the blade of the propellor and turned the engine over a dozen times until all its twelve lungs were full of gas then the Medico made the contact which sent the electric current through the spark plugs and once more Phil threw his weight on the propeller blade.

The result was a series of explosions so close to pistol shots that Basilio and a half dozen loafing Mexicans neary threw themseves on their stomachs. Then they arose to gape in wonder at the barking roaring thing which stood chafing at the blocks of wood placed under the front wheels to prevent it from running away.

The real marvel was not that the engine was running once more but the fact that Marvin had started it without being killed by the propeller. To start an aeroplane engine requires strength, nerve and knack. One must throw his entire weight on one of the blades and yet get out of the way of the other which whirls down like an avenging sword. Many a veteran aviator has had his skull split in two by a small mistake in the operation.

Now nobody warned Marvin because nobody except the American had even seen an aeroplane before and Phil's memory was gone. But here again it was the boy's sub-conscious self manifesting as it did when his hands made repairs which seemed incomprehensible to his conscious mind. Sub-consciously Marvin performed the dangerous feat in exactly the right way and hardly gave it a thought.

Everyone within ear-shot of the scene was soon gathered around, and one and all crowded closer and closer to the invisible whirling blades. Marvin yelled at them to keep away from the front of the plane. They couldn't hear him but they understood his warning gestures and gathered in the rear. The Medico retarded the spark slowing down the motor, Marvin removed the blocks from the wheel and climbed in behind him.

Advancing the spark lever and giving her a little more gas, the engine roared loud and the plane started slowly rolling over the flat firm Mesa.

Basilio and Inez suddenly awoke from their trance and shouted an unheard warning not to fly. Basilio was about to rush up and grasp Marvin by the arm when a disconcerting thing happened to them all Phil let out another notch and the blast of air from the propeller instantly removed every hat from the spectators. Like a flock of rabbits, the score of sombreros, with Farley's panama hat in leed, rolled back fifty feet and stopped. Basilio made a vain grab for his, turned and looked after it then collided with a brother Greaser in pursuit of his own head gear, paused to curse him and then found it too late to catch Marvin.

For ten minutes the plane taxied around the Mesa at varying speeds then heading into the wind it made a little hop of perhaps fifty feet, the wheels scarcely clear of the ground. At this Basilio hurried into the house. The aeroplane now ran down the field before the wind turned and with clamoring engine rushed past them once more.

With dismay Inez saw the machine rise from the ground, sway, slightly, hang a moment, a few feet above the earth and then start to climb. Slowly she became conscious of a crackling sound, and looking toward the patient beheld Basilio, his rifle carefully aimed firing away at the retreating aeroplane.

Marvin and the Medico absorbed in the fascinating business of flying, had no suspicions of Basilio's attentions. The bullets were going wild but Inez didn't know this as she seized the nearest object (a galvanized iron pail) and rushed at the guard. Just as the Mexican was aiming the last shot in his magazine the girl, with a vicious swing, brought the pail down on his head and knocked him insensible.

Poor, girl she meant well, but it was the wrong thing to do. A Mexican common soldier is the champion bad shot of all the world. Just leave him alone and he will miss a barn door at one hundred paces. The aeroplane was now so far away that even a sharp shooter would have had little hope. But the girl's blow on the head spoiled his aim—he fired blindly and the bullet went throught the top of Marvin's helmet.
