

Good Principles

are the necessary basis of good living, but sound precepts loose much of their force if the preacher fails to practise what he preaches.

We preach fair dealing, fair prices and good goods—we believe in these and practise them. They work both ways; help those who deal with us, and so help us.

The Union Commercial College reopens for the winter term on Monday January 6th at 9.30 a. m.

The fact that many teachers throughout the Province are giving up their schools to attend the Union Commercial College is proof positive of the excellence of this institution.

The first touch typist ever graduated from a Provincial business college was Miss Lizzie Harris who secured this distinction from the Union Commercial College nine years ago. Every year since touch typists have been graduated from this school.

There are a number of new desks at the Union Commercial College. How about reserving one for you when the college reopens next week.

MORTAL LIFE

these rather than mere physical power that determine the status of the individual and differentiate him from his fellows. Knowing practically nothing of the essential nature of man or of the ultimate purpose for which he was called into being we cannot establish any absolute standard by which the value of any particular type of being can be determined, but unquestionably his power as a self-conscious individual is measurable.

(1) By the measure of understanding it is dominated by the Will.

(2) By the character of his desires, affections and aspirations.

(3) By the extent to which action is dominated by the Will.

But the fact that these are rarely if ever developed co-ordinately renders the application of such standard a matter of much difficulty.

A man of very limited knowledge and weak will but whose general character is discernable as true, tender and good may justifiably be deemed of a higher type of manhood than is another man who, though possessed of much knowledge and a strong will, is distinguished as cruel and false.

Our judgments cannot embrace and co-ordinate all the facts but they can embody a measure of insight.

We can discern that in the matter of intellect there is a marked difference between an ignorant savage and a man like Isaac Newton; in strength of will between a man as the Duke of Wellington and a besotted drunkard; in general character between a man like Nero and a man like Paul.

Can we go further than this and assign the development of these powers to definite causes? Let us consider each in turn.

How comes it that men differ in the amount of understanding they possess? As understanding is a form of consciousness and as we are utterly at a loss to conceive what consciousness is we must needs realize at the outset that all we can hope to attain is not a solution of the problem but merely a measure of insight.

But in as much as understanding does not exist in the child to the extent to which it does in the man, its development comes within our experimental range and can be made an object of study.

The developed product we may term intellectual understanding. (There is a form of understanding associated with feeling which is not necessarily intellectual which must be taken into account later).

The infant, after having been for a few weeks subjected to its forces begins to take notice of the world that lies about him—i. e. to bring his intellectual faculties into play.

In accordance with the effect produced upon himself he seeks to bring himself into touch with certain things and to avoid contact with other things.

But he does not stop there. He begins to ask himself—What is this? Why is this? In attempting to walk he stumbles and falls against a chair striking his head.

As a result certain states are set up in consciousness. He is conscious that he fell. That his head came in contact with the chair. That a sensation of pain followed.

These sensations being linked together he endeavors to discern their relationship. At first he will attribute his suffering to the chair and proceed to beat and beat the chair lightly with his fingers.

The chair as presented to consciousness is the same but the sensation of contact is different and there is no pain. When he compares these two experiences he will be led to associate his former suffering not with the chair but with the act of falling against it.

Herein is displayed a greater measure of understanding and, noting how it was developed, we are led to realize that knowledge is based upon analysis and comparison of experience.

It therefore follows that the extent of any man's intellectual understanding is dependent upon the number and kind of experiences he has and the care and accuracy with which he examines them.

A man who has lived many years, who has travelled far and kept his eyes and ears on the alert will possess a much larger store of experiences than will a child who has lived but a few years in a quiet family circle, and, given the necessary intellectual capacity, can attain to a more extended general knowledge.

But quality must be taken into account as well as quantity. If the child enjoys experiences of love and is led to cherish aspirations such as the man never has he may in his limited range acquire a deeper and more fundamental understanding of life.

The same result would follow so far as intelligent understanding is concerned even though the man had the child's experiences and refused to make them the subject of thought.
