"Jealous Hearts"

By MILDRED BARBOUR

THE ARTISTIC TOUCH.

"If you don't mind—I had enough of scenery in my childhood. When the moon rises, I'd rather be at Monte Carlo, playing baccarat, or gawking at some smart place in Paris."

The glow faded from his eyes. He sighed and became once more the fashionable New York maestro.

"I have wearied and bored you with my dreams. Forgive me. You are hungry, is it not so? Eh bien, we shall dine."

He touched a bell, and one of the Japanese servants glided in, bringing the first course of a dinner composed solely of Japanese dishes. Elinor, after she had become accustomed to the startlingly new flavor of the food, found it delicious.

They returned to the ways of the Occident after the sweet—to the extent of having coffee.

They were chatting, Elinor with her lovely head thrown back against the bower of chrysanthemums, her white throat generously revealed by the green and gold wrap, and Danelli lounging in the cushions at her feet, when the door-bell rang.

They heard one of the Jap's padding through the hall to answer it, heard a soft, sibilant sound from him, heard a woman's voice shrill: "Of course, he's in! The studio is lighted. Stand aside, you fool!"

THE INQUISITIVE LADY.

The door of Danelli's studio was flung open abruptly.

Mrs. Agatha Archers Arnold, tight-lipped, with a bright scarlet spot in her haggard, sallow cheeks, stood in the doorway, wrapped in a magnificent ermine evening coat.

Danelli, lounging on the heap of cushions at Elinor's side, came to do, and I may not resent it."

He dropped swiftly to his knees beside her, clasped her hands in his, and bent over her, his dark eyes aflame.

But Elinor withdrew her hands casually, and stifled a tiny yawn.

"If your dinner's quite finished, Danelli, I'll be running along." She sprang to her feet with a quick movement.

"Sure you're not going to bring on some Jap acrobats?" She smiled maliciously down at him as he still knelt, looking a trifle disconcerted. "No? Then I'm off."

"A thousand pardons for intruding upon such... an auspicious occasion..."

his feet with admirable grace. He bowed suavely, outwardly unperturbed.

"My dear friend, what a pleasure!"

"Hmm!" sniffed Mrs. Agatha Archers Arnold.

Her acid glance sped to Elinor and should have stabbed her, but that young lady, after an indifferent nod to the older woman, had picked up her gold vanity-case and begun leisurely to powder her nose.

She prolonged the process to study, with complete self-possession, her own enchanting reflection in the tiny mirror.

"So this is your 'dearest friend from Naples'?" Mrs. Arnold turned with icy hauteur to Danelli.

"A thousand pardons for intruding upon such an... er... of her glance at him—"

"and might care to join us for the opera and supper. I bid you good-night!"

With no further glance toward Elinor, she swept out.

Danelli followed her, courteously, to the outer door and closed it behind her. When he returned to the studio, his face was quite impassive. It showed no signs either of discomfiture, anger, or regret.

Elinor was chuckling.

"What did I tell you in the car on the way up here? I had a hunch she'd come to see for herself just hold old and what sex 'you' friend from Naples' was. Danelli, as a flirt, you're a wow, but, in some respects, you're a child about women!"

He shrugged and lit a slender Japanese cigarette.

"You American ladies are—bewildering. One never knows—"

"Where you are—or where they are," nodded Elinor. "Take my advice, Danelli, and leave off trying to play your game with us. Go home to your Italy and marry some pretty girl who'll stay where you put her. That's what you foreigners like. Why try to pretend that you don't?"

Thanks for everything."

She reluctantly laid aside the exquisite green and gold wrap.

"I'll bet the Arnold cat wondered about that," she chuckled to herself.

Danelli got to his feet a trifle sulkily.

"Will you do me the honor to keep the wrap?"

She stared at him.

"Keep this lovely thing? Why, it must be priceless!"

"You shall wear it again," he smiled strangely, "when you sing 'Butterfly.'"

At home, after Danelli had left her at her door, kissing her hand with his customary deference and grace, Elinor held up the green and gold brocade bridal gown of a Japanese princess and gazed over it.

For the man who had given it to her she had no thought, no sense of gratitude. He had been dismissed from her consciousness when her door had closed after him.

She was thinking of herself in the role of Cho-Cho-San. She could see herself crossing the bridge, with her maids behind her, the little Japanese bride in pink, the tall American lieutenant. She could fairly see the audience that listened breathlessly to her golden voice, the audience that applauded her madly when she finished.

She hummed the aria as she hung away the gift of Danelli.

After she was in bed, yawning with healthy fatigue, she thought of the discomfited Mrs. Agatha Archers Arnold and chuckled in the darkness.

"That was a rather a knock-out for the old girl!" she said.

But, had she known it, Mrs. Arnold was not the woman to relinquish to another anything that she most ardently wanted to keep. She was both spiteful and resourceful. In this particular instance, she was motivated by a savage jealousy.

Elinor was young and beautiful. Mrs. Arnold was middle-aged and no longer.

She was going to fight to the bitter end, not dreaming that to Elinor, he was only a convenience.

Late as it was, when she returned home that night, she sat down at her desk and began to write a letter.

Woman's Wisdom

Kingston, Ont.—"Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is such a great help to nature in motherhood, I marvel that every prospective mother does not take it. I had two children before I knew that there was such a tonic. My former experiences caused me dread. By chance I read that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription quieted the nervous system, strengthened the body of the expectant mother and I proved that statement to be true. Also I had comparatively no suffering and did not lose any of my strength or vitality. My baby is now 2 years old and weighs 30 lbs. is the picture of health."—Mrs. Olive Brown, 12 Markland St., Liquid or tablets at the drug store. Write Dr. Pierce, Buffalo, N.
