IMPORTED BRIDES.

The romance of the imported bride is one that it would take many books to tell, and each chapter of every volume might develop a dramatic climax. Sometimes the conclusion reveals the bridegroom waiting anxiously at the wharf with one eye fixed upon the nearest "marrying justice." Again it shows him placidly toiling at his desk or work bench, he having mistaken the time of the steamship's arrival, while the bride, feeling herself deserted, weeps in the detention pen. Generally, however, in the latter instance as in the former, the man and woman meet and wed, and the "assistant immigrant" becomes the happy mother of good citizens. One must go outside of Boston, as a rule, to find the recreant or changeable type of importation; and Canada has recently presented two specimens which seem so interesting that one is tempted to display them in print.

At Glace Bay, N. S., and at Strathcona, Alta., within a week, two imported brides "went back on" the men they had come to marry. In the Nova Scotia case, the young woman was brought over from Scotland. The man who expected to be-

"We have just received a nice lot of walking sticks specially selected for the Xmas trade—They are the very latest in style and not too expensive, ranging in price from 50c upwards.—E. A. Foster, Central Drugstore, Sunnyside. 12-12dtf.

come her husband, himself a Scotchman, paid forty dollars for her transportation; but at the house in which she boarded she met another Scotchman, fell in love with him and refused to fulfill her engagement. This was bad enough; yet the Alberta incident might have been worse for there, when a wagon load of beer had been provided and every thirty soul in the neighborhood had hastened to the wedding, the prospective bride declined to wed with any but a former admirer. Women 'openly lamented and strong men secretly shed tears. A stranger would have taken it for granted that a funeral, not a wedding, absorbed that grief-stricken village. It chanced, however, that the earlier admirer, who had been invited by the bride herself, was a courageous and resourceful man. At the moment when the frenzied guests were preparing to forget their "manners" and fall upon the refreshments, he approached the man who had planned to marry, asked how much had been paid for the importation of his bride, and finally bought the others right and title for one hundred dollars. Then the festivities proceeded. Unhappily there was no such cheerful ending to the Nova Scotia romance. The disgraced lover, vowing that, if he lost his bride, he would regain his ed on a capias, and at last accounts the favored interloper had failed to redeem her; for, though on pleasure he was bent, he had a frugal mind.

What shall one offer as the "moral" of these episodes? That the young woman who consents to be imported shall fetch or find a second string to her bow? Or that the man who pays the bill shall welcome a rival who, if occasion arises, will be able to repay it? The persons engaged in the Alberta affair met both conditions, and the outcome seemed happier, surely, than that which, in Nova Scotia, took the form of a capias in the hands of a sheriff. Nevertheless, one hesitates to generalize. Perhaps the two Canadians deserved to be fined—the one $40, the other $100—for importing brides of whose stead-
