The Third Warning

A Mystery Love Story

By Augustus Mahr

"I'm not keen myself, but I'll tell you what I'll ask Margot to lunch with me in Edinburgh, if you'll give us a lift."

"Splendid," said George. "Take out the lassie and cheer her up. She'll need it all Ronny, after you went off to bed last night I had two or three more pipes."

"Why what do you mean—did you go out after all?"

"I had my little walk every hour or so. I decided to run no risks. To conclude that Shaw has got away with the boodle struck me as rather jumping to conclusions, or so it seemed to me when I thought about it carefully. So I decided to carry out my arrangement after all. As Shakespeare says, not a mouse was stirring on the beasty battlements."

"You're a Trojan," I declared. "You come to Scotland for a holiday and here I run you in for all this! You've been putting your head in a noose every day of the week, and what are you getting out of it?"

"The best fun I've had for years, chuckled George. "Now you buzz along and ask Margot to lunch. Be sure to ask her nicely."

I was back in the cottage in a very short time despondent. "She got a bad headache," "Kirsty tells me," I informed him. "Kirsty's keeping her in bed till it moves off. So you push on to Edinburgh alone, old thing. I've heaps to do about here."

When George had gone, promising to be back before tea-time, I drew up a chair to the fire and sat there thinking. The day was chilly; a damp spongy mist that hung round made one almost forget it was summer. But the fog outside was nothing to the fog in my brain; and each new turn that events took seemed to lead farther away from a solution. It was like playing a game of chess, with the moves of your opponent concealed from you. Fumbling, we were, in a fog much more dense than the fog that advanced and retired in pallid platoons of vapor outside the window.

I reached for a poker to stir the fire, and there was none, so I stretched to a corner of the mantelpiece where the old laird's walking-stick had hung ever since I had shoved it there one careless moment. I was served well for my laziness in not strolling to the kitchen and getting the decent hefty iron implement that had lain beside me on the sofa a few nights ago, for the walking-stick got beautifully jammed between the bars. I lay back and tugged. I was quite unprepared for the result of my simple action. To my utter amazement the handle came away from the shaft of the stick—but with it came a long tapering blade of shining steel that pencilled to a vicious point! I gazed at the thing in my hand as if it were alive and had turned round and bitten me.

The laird's walking-stick was a camouflaged rapier!—and a mighty dangerous one to run against in a scuffle. Why on earth had the old laird required this? A clear enough proof, it was, to my mind that his last days had not been without some keen consciousness of danger.

I hauled out the stick from the bar of the fire and examined it, then slid the blade home into its scabbard. I must have accidentally pulled back part of the silver ferrule which had acted as a lock, and had released the blade. I slipped into a waterproof, jammed a cap on my head and pushed out into the fog.

The fog was thinner now. The wind was veering south and driving it back to sea. Of a sudden it would lift in front of you like a blanket being twitched upward, and you could see for fifty or eighty yards ahead; the next moment it had blown down so that even the outline of the hedge across the lane wavered and melted into chalk-like space. I climbed into the field, and made for the Home Farm, where a clump of bushes that hung around the ridge opposite the farm-house formed a natural shelter, and I got among them prepared to pass a boring couple of hours of incessant watching.

Lying there with my eyes fixed on the garden gate, a new thought occurred to me. What if Seymour had also bolted? The notion intrigued me. It seemed stupid to be there waiting for him to emerge if the man were gone. But it was a simple matter to find out. I retraced my steps a hundred yards up the hedge side, broke through into the lane, and made my way to the farmhouse.

"Ah Jessie," I said, "is Forsyth in just now? He's not I just wanted to refer to the estate books for a moment."

"Come in, sir. Just go right through."

"Mr. Seymour at home just now?" I asked casually, as I was about to close the office door behind me.

"Aye, sir—would you like to see him?"

"Not at all," I declared. "I don't want to disturb him I dare say we've both lots to do this morning."

"He'll be going out any minute, sir," said Jessie. "I've made sandwiches for him—he's going up the hills to sketch, sir. He thinks the mist'll lift."

I nodded and closed the door. If he were going up among the hills to sketch on a day like this, then he must be mighty keen. I sat down at the desk and twiddled with a pencil. Footsteps went along the passage, there was a murmur of voices, and the back door slammed. Seymour had set out, but whether or not to sketch I couldn't guess.

Mowat and MacGillivray Creditors Face Serious Loss

OTTAWA, April 20—Unless promotion stocks in the vaults of Mowat & MacGillivray, defunct stock brokerage house, can be sold at somewhere near their book value, creditors will be faced with a serious loss. This was the substance of a report made today by G. T. Clarkson, the official custodian, to a meeting of the creditors. If the stocks bring their book value claimants may receive between 75 and 90 cents on the dollar, but if they prove worthless, the division will be in the neighborhood of fifteen percent.

Liabilities were placed at $955,630 and assets at $871,220. Unsecured customers' claims amounting to $641,574.50 comprise the largest item in the liabilities. Creditors number between 2,500 and 2,700. The firm's head office was in Ottawa and branches were operated at several points in the Ottawa Valley and in the Maritime Provinces.

Whether or not the brokers were technically guilty of bucketing, Mr. Clarkson was unable to say. It appeared that customers' orders to buy stock had always been executed, but the stock was frequently hypothecated to banks for loans.

The firm had started in 1924 with assets of $7,500 and had run this up to $78,000 in five years. The entire amount was later lost, transactions in the stock of Arno mines being chiefly responsible for the collapse.

The five inspectors will meet shortly for transaction of creditors' business. G. T. Clarkson was appointed permanent custodian.

At the time the firm was prohibited from doing business last month, said the trustees' statement, it was
